"Jews will never have even the possibility of seeing God's power at work in the world unless they recant the dogma that the Holocaust proves there is no God, unless they forswear the idolatrous belief that only the State of Israel can ensure Jewish survival, and unless they give up looking for God in the narrow, private realm of ethnicity and 'psycho-Judaism' on the one hand, and a sham spirituality on the other, be it ersatz Chassidism or 'Jewish meditation workshops.' "

Launching a bold and exaggerated attack on what he calls the "Holocaust Cult," he bemoans the resources expended on Holocaust museums, the emphasis on UJA death camp pilgrimages and the influence of Eli Weisel.

"Like his predecessor in the Temple of old, Weisel has found that being High Priest is not without its benefits. Lionized by Jews and non-Jews alike, he can command five-figure fees for his speaking engagements, to which he has been known to fly by private plane. He is a man whose honors have ranged from receiving the Nobel Peace Prize to throwing out the first ball at a World Series game."

By focusing on the Holocaust, Jews relegate themselves to the status of victims, managing somehow to survive despite God's complicity in the persecution. Moreover, competition inevitably develops among the victimized. Even now, blacks are trying to build a museum in Washington D.C. memorializing slavery and racism.

"As the marketplace of victims

Time to jettison 'Ultra'

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

Guest Voices

These days, when all Jews have been poignantly, tragically reminded of the Talmudic assertion that words have great power for evil as well as for good, it would be a wonderful time for Jewish journalists and periodicals to jettison the most common pejorative in common Jewish use — the term "Ultra-Orthodox."

"Ultra," according to my favorite word source (the American Heritage Dictionary), has among its meanings "immoderately adherent" or "exceeding what is common, moderate or proper" (emphasis mine). Other sources use synonyms like "extreme" or "too much."

Thus the term "Ultra-Orthodox" pointedly, if subtly, presents a reader with an immediate subjective bias, something that responsible journalism — and responsible human beings, for that matter — should avoid whenever possible. The Jews to whom that unflattering phrase is usually fastened may indeed be uncompromisingly faithful to the Jewish heritage, but they are hardly improper or immoderate (other than with respect to society at large — itself, many would contend, a less-than-shining example of moderation).

We who are labeled "Ultras" may well exceed what is Jewishly "common," sadly, in these amoral and assimilationist times, but we are hardly "extreme," a word more often — and aptly — applied to neo-Nazis and terrorists.

And "improper?" Does not the word "proper," at least from a Jewish perspective, encompass those who endeavor to practise the full spectrum of Jewish law and Jewish values? If that endeavor is indeed "too much," then we Jews as a people are in deeper trouble than we suspect.

Whether most Jews today choose to live religiously observant lives or not, those who plan their days on earth in consonance with Jewish law as codified for many centuries and practised by our common Jewish ancestors for millennia — are quintesentially Jewish, not "ultra"-anything. We haredim (from the Hebrew word for "tremble" — a reference to a verse that applies the term to meticulously observant Jews) may not be the Jewish mainstream in a sociological sense, but we are very much the Jewish mainstream in a historical one.

Using a term that marginalizes us, moreover, is not only an inexcusable, if subtle, vilification, it also sends a terrible subliminal message: that way — the way of dedication to the full Jewish heritage — lies madness. The message becomes all the more lamentable when one reflects on how the Jewish "identity" and "continuity" so desperately sought by so many Jewish leaders and organizations thrive, by all accounts, among us you-know-whos.

Contrary to popular imagination, we haredi Jews are not backward, do not sanction stone-throwing (and certainly not worse violence) and consider all our fellow Jews — observant or not — to be our brothers and sisters. The haredi community, furthermore, includes doctors, lawyers, computer programmers and professors, in addition to full-time mothers and full-time students of the traditions and texts of our religious heritage. Most haredim, moreover, while rejective of elements of what passes for culture in modern society, are nevertheless quite aware of and even conversant with the larger society around them, not to mention technologically adept.

Where haredim stand out is in their refusal to compromise the tenets or laws of their — our — religion. A haredi lawyer or businessman might interrupt a meeting for Minchah and haredi families are often rather large, compared to the Jewish norm. Haredim place a great emphasis on the study of the holy literature of the Jewish heritage — the deep and poignant wisdom of the ancient Jewish rabbis as well as the formidable corpus of Jewish law — and on communal and personal chesed or "benevolence." The latter is well-evidenced, not only in countless individual haredi lives, but in a host of haredi community services and organizations — including, among other things, free-loan societies, organized care for the sick and the destitute and community food-banks (all of which extend help not only to haredim but to all Jews in need). Those are some haredi "immoderations."

Wouldn't the members of the haredi community be more constructively — and accurately — portrayed, not as radicals but as examples, not as a threat to their fellow Jews but as a precious resource?

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency has largely laid aside its supply of "Ultra-Orthodox" labels, opting instead for either the awkward but circumspect "fervently Orthodox" or the simple and straightforward "haredi."

Isn't it really time that all Jewish periodicals and journalists followed suit?

becomes increasingly crowded with more and more competitors, Jews and blacks will have to hawk their wares more stridently to make themselves heard above the din."

He takes to task Rabbi Emil Fackenheim who advocated a 614th commandment: "Jews are forbidden to hand Hitler a posthumous victory." This, says Goldberg, is an imperative "as devoid of any real content or rationale as the 'just do it' of a sports shoe ad."

The author maintains that the primary reason for remaining Jewish is found in the story of the Exodus, in which God redeems the Israelites from slavery and makes with them an eternal covenant at Sinai. To transform North Americans from a collection of random individuals into cohesive communities, a number of commitments are necessary. These include study, prayer and acts of ethical concern.

"Torah directs Jews 'inward' so that they can internalize who and what they are to be. T'fillah directs Jews 'upward' to seek Heaven's help so that they can become such people. Chesed directs Jews 'outward' into the world to show how such a people and community can make a vital difference." The Jewish people will survive, despite all persecution, because "they are the linchpin of God's redemption of the world."

Jewish people will survive

As His part of the covenant, it is the Jewish people that God promises to preserve and not individuals. The most distinctive evidence of His presence is that the Nazis — although they tried desperately — ultimately failed to murder the entire Jewish people.

This outspoken and challenging volume raises profound and necessary questions. Goldberg, however, weakens his arguments by excess and overstatement. The impact of the Holocaust and the importance of Israel cannot be set aside in so cavalier a fashion. Moreover, his basic thesis would have wider appeal if the concepts of Redemption and Covenant were not tied to a biblical literalism, but were broadened and reinterpreted in the light of Jewish history.

Community leaders remembered

David Satok served in numerous posts in CJC

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Satok, a prominent figure on the national Jewish communal scene, died Jan. 29 at his home in Toronto, following a 14-month battle with cancer. He was 64.

A former chair of the Ontario region of the Canadian Jewish Congress, he held a number of leading posts within Congress including chair of the national executive and the national community relations committee.

When he was presented with the Samuel Bronfman medal for distinguished service to Congress last May at a plenary session, Satok responded: "We Jews are a stiffed necked people, and perhaps this has been one of my less endearing traits. Whenever I felt in my conscience and in my gut that something was the right thing to do, the Jewish thing to do, I went ahead and did it, even when I knew that it might well generate controversy. But what I do want all of you to know is that whatever I have said or done, I have done without malice, and out of a deep commitment to the community's good."

Born in Toronto, he was a graduate of Oakwood Collegiate and made his mark in the investment and real estate business.

As national chair of the committee for Soviet Jewry, he spearheaded the fight in the early days to convince the government of the former Soviet Union to let Jews emigrate to Israel.

He was an inveterate letter writer to The CJN often criticizing actions of communal organizations.

His eulogy at the funeral serice at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue was delivered by Rabbi Emmanuel Forman, former rabbi of the synagogue, who made aliyah and now lives in Israel. Rabbi Forman was visiting in California when he heard of his close friend's death.

'He was my mentor, my confidante and my conscience," said Les Scheininger, president of Congress from 1989 to 1992.

Satok was particularly effective in motivating younger leaders to take over responsibility in communal affairs, the former Congress president said.

Satok's most recent initiative was in organizing medical supplies for victims of war in the former Yugoslavia, according to Manuel Prutschi, Ontario region executive director.

A founding member of Christian-Jewish Dialogue in Toronto, Satok was committed to racial and religious harmony, said Prutschi. He recalled that Satok took part in the famous Martin Luther King march to Washington.

He was appointed chair of the National Budgeting Conference (now the Council of Jewish Federations) in 1986 and represented Congress on the governing council of the World Jewish Congress in Jerusalem, Geneva and Washington.

"He always had the best interests of Canadian and World Jewry at heart,"said Congress president Goldie Hershon.

Surviving him are his wife, Lila, four children, Paula, Mark, Maxine and Jonathan, three sisters, Edith Weiss, Estelle Steinhauer and Joy Lipkin, and five grandchildren.

Egit was involved in social action

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Well-known community activist and yiddishist Jacob Egit died suddenly in Florida on Jan. 25. He was 87.

Egit was born in Boryslaw, Galicia. From a very early age, he was involved in social action, working for the underground.

When the Germans invaded, Egit fled to the Soviet Union, where he organized food transports for the army.

From 1945 to 1950, Egit was director of cultural affairs for an area of Jewish colonization for Holocaust survivors in Lower Silesia. During the Stalinist purges, however, he was arrested and imprisoned for "nationalist" tendencies.

After the death of Stalin, Egit was released and went with his family to Vienna. They eventually made their way to Israel and then in 1957, to Canada.

He began to work with Histadrut, and for many years was assistant director. He created an umbrella organization of landsmanschaften called the United Organizations for Histadrut, for which he was executive director.

Egit was very concerned about Nazi demonstrations in Allan Gardens in the early 1960s and organized and participated in counter-demonstrations. He felt very strongly that Canadian Jewish Congress was not taking a strong enough role in this matter, and lobbied intensely for them to do so.

He joined Congress himself and worked with their public relations, community relations and Holocaust remembrance committees.

He was also active in the Yiddish Kulturgeselschaft, a Yiddish cultural organization that arranges public lectures by prominent writers.

He was described by Ben Kayfetz and Sam Lipshitz, both of whom worked with him over the years, as a striking figure with a dynamic personality and an excellent speaker.

Mark Egit speaks of him in another way, as affectionate to his family, romantic to his wife and a proud grandfather.

One of his proudest achievements in later years was the establishment of the Jacob and Clara Egit Foundation for Holocaust Literature, which provided funds to publish material in any language on the Holocaust.

Egit is survived by Clara, his wife of 53 years, sons Richard and Mark, daughter Mary Betel, eight grandchildren and one great-grandchild.

Cass performed ritual circumcisions

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Isadore Cass, a noted physician and the first medical doctor in Toronto to perform ritual circumcisions, died Jan. 24 of cancer. He was 80.

Cass was educated in Toronto and graduated from the University of Toronto's medical school. After serving with the army during World War II, he returned to Toronto to private practice.

In 1953, he began studying pathology and stayed in that field for the rest of his professional career, first performing research at the Ontario Cancer Institute, Connaught Labs and the Ontario Department of Health.

For 23 years, until his retirement in 1986, he was chief of pathology at Ajax and Pickering hospitals.

Dr. Isadore Cass

Trained many physicians

In 1945, he began doing ritual circumcisions, and, according to his family, performed over 40,000 throughout Canada and the eastern United States. He also trained many physicians in that skill.

Cass was well versed in Torah, having studied with the late Rabbi Jacob Gordon. For many years he was baal koreh at Goel Tzedec Synagogue, and continued in this role at the Orthodox minyan at Beth Tzedec.

He continued to study and teach Torah throughout his life. He was chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Tanach study group for many years, and led weekly Gemara classes at Beth Tzedec.

In 1971, he became interested in Machanaiim, a highly regarded educational institution of rabbinical studies in Israel. He and his family established a fund at the school in memory of his brother, Rabbi Samuel Cass, and his family, who were killed in a traffic accident.

In her eulogy, his daughter Sharon described how "he knew the entire Torah by heart. He would say, 'Begin a sentence and I'll tell you where it is from and finish the passage,' and he inevitably did."

He was a member of many organizations, including the Israel Medical Association, the Ontario Medical Association, General Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, and the Institute of Orthodox Jewish Scientists. He belonged to Shaarei Shomayim and Beth Lida synagogues, as well as Lubavitch.

It was the Lubavitcher rebbe who urged him to go into pathology, giving him a blessing "that in the practice of pathology you will never have to desecrate Shabbat or Yom Tov," a blessing that came true.

Cass is survived by his wife of 55 years, Miriam; daughters Sharon, Hyla, Judy and Elaine; brothers Harry, Al and Eli; sisters Miriam Cass and Zelda Fink; seven grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

Matar steps outside 'ordinary' to make a difference

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ruth Matar is soft-spoken, charming, artistic, with a frequent twinkle in her eyes. Not at all what one would expect from a flaming radical.

But then Matar, founder and a leader of the Women in Green, an organization at the forefront of the demonstrations against the peace process, does not consider herself a radical.

She is merely, she told The CJN in a recent interview, carrying out her right to protest — an inherent right in a democratic society, she believes.

Matar, 67, escaped from Nazi-occupied Austria in a Children's Transport to Sweden. Later she was reunited with her parents in the United States.

She, her husband, and their four children made aliyah in 1977.

"We were living ordinary lives, and happy ones. But we felt that we had to step outside our ordinary lives and do the things that needed doing."

Before the signing of the first Oslo accord in 1993, Matar, her daughter-in-law Nadia and a handful of friends saw what they perceived as a dangerous situation.

"We saw very clearly that whatever the Rabin government had promised to get elected, they were going back on — keeping the Golan, not negotiating with the PLO and never permitting a Palestinian state."

Their first demonstration, outside Yitzhak Rabin's house, was described in the press, to their shock, as a demonstration of radical settler women and Bnai Akiva kids.

"They were deliberately trying to pigeon hole the opposition to make it appear unrepresentative."

From that small group, the Women in Green (the name comes from the Green Line dividing the pre-1967 borders with the territories, not from the hats, as is often thought) has grown to an organization of over 5,000, all over Israel, in Toronto and in the United States.

The Israeli government, the "government controlled" press and the foreign ministry has consistently blackened their name, Matar charged.

It has been most blatant recently, Matar said. "The government has used Rabin's assassination in the most cynical, unforgivable manner. They have blamed an entire segment of the population for his murder — it's as if the Democrats had said that the Republicans killed Kennedy."

A week after the assassination, journalist Nachum Barnea charged in Yediot Achronot that it was incitement by protest groups like the Women in Green and their leader Nadia Matar that caused the assassination.

Barnea eventually went too far. He accused the Matars of equating the Rabin government to Hitler's in one of their speeches in the United States. When a videotape of the event proved that that had not happened — indeed, the Matars were not even at the program — the newspaper, which they sued for 1½ million shekels, was forced to print an apology, claiming that the Foreign Office had misled them.

Israeli consulates in North America, Matar said, can and do accuse them of just about anything without being taken to task for it. Matar now makes sure that as a precaution, all her speeches are taped.

The Women in Green, Matar said somewhat wistfully, "want our children and grandchildren to live in a Jewish state — that's their right.

"Rabin and now [Shimon] Peres said they were doing it (working for the peace process) for their own children as well, so that they wouldn't have to go to war.

"But we fear that we will have the biggest war ever."

Like David Ben-Gurion, Matar said, "We feel that we don't have the right to give away the land. If that makes us radical, so be it."

Contrary to another myth, members of the Women in Green by and large are not from the territories. While Nadia Matar lives in Efrat, most of their strength is in the big cities, such as Jerusalem, Beersheva and Tel Aviv.

The ongoing peace negotiatons are a matter of serious concern to Matar. Charging that Arafat and his supporters do not truly want peace, she fears that "unless we can prevent the present government from being re-elected, it will be the end of Jerusalem as a united city, and it may be the end of Israel as a Jewish state, although it may survive as a secular one."

The recent riots by Ethiopian Jews about the dumping of their blood because of a fear of AIDS, Matar said, had a significance beyond the matter of blood.

"They felt they didn't have a voice, that there was no way to express their unhappiness. That's not just them — that's the feeling all over Israel."

The Women in Green have been beaten, arrested and jailed on nine different occasions. They are now fighting five criminal indictments all of which, Matar insists, are unfounded.

"It costs us money, time and effort, which the government feels will lower our effectiveness. But it won't stop us."

The Women in Green, Matar said, have never called either Rabin or Peres traitors. "We feel that they are misguided, that they have a dream that is just not working out.

"The rift in the country can be healed if there is the will on both sides to stop blaming each other and work together."

Baycrest Women's Auxiliary celebrates 40th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Women's Auxiliary (WA) of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care is celebrating 40 years of ongoing dedication to the centre's residents and patients.

Shortly after the opening of the centre on Bathurst Street in 1954, the auxiliary became a legal entity. But women volunteers are credited with the founding of the centre more than 80 years ago, when it was known as the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home.

To mark their 40th anniversary, Alma Waldman, a past president and archivist for the auxiliary, has prepared a history, decade by decade, outlining WA contributions to the development of the centre.

Waldman, who was brought in to the auxiliary more than 30 years ago by its founder, Dora Till, reflects on the "big changes" which have taken place since then.

"Over these 30 years, just as lifestyles have changed, the auxiliary has changed. We have a vibrant youthful core of hard-working women who have turned volunteerism into a profession. It is wonderful to see the children and grandchildren of our charter members working together side by side — it is truly an intergeneration auxiliary and each generation has much to contribute."

From the early days, when the women performed hands-on tasks to care for the elderly on Cecil Street and worked to raise pennies, the auxiliary has grown to a membership of more than 4,000. It now raises millions of dollars and heads many major projects of the centre.

"For me," says Waldman, "the service programs are the closest to my heart — the Shalom Oneg Shabbat programs for all hospital patients, sherry luncheons for the female residents of the Jewish Home for the Aged (JHA), receptions for new residents, afternoon teas for the women patients in the hospital, the library, the WA cafe, celebrating 70+ birthdays for Terrace residents and the welcome reception for new residents to the JHA."

These programs, which are funded by endowments, are chaired by Debbie Mason, a vice-president of the auxiliary, Waldman notes.

'We also present health forums, tours'

"We also present health forums, leadership development, tours and we have a speakers' bureau."

Judy Csillag, recently appointed director of the WA, is enthusiastic about the accomplishments of the auxiliary.

"Every single day I walk out and see the fruits of our labor and realize the impact that the Women's Auxiliary has had on the development of Baycrest. The women played an integral part in the establishment of the day-care program, the Alzheimer's program, the Esther Exton Child Care Centre and much more."

Gilda Goodman, auxiliary president, says that under the leadership of Tobie Bekhor, the immediate past president, they have undertaken to raise $5 million over the next five years. The money will go to the Capital Campaign for the new JHA building and to an Alzheimer's research fellowship at the Rotman Research Institute.

Parents told to teach children about sex

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's up to parents to teach their kids what they need to know about sex, says Sue Johanson, a sex educator, counsellor, author and TV personality.

"Too many questions about sex are not being answered in school so that leaves us, as parents, to be the primary educators," Johanson said at a recent program sponsored by the AIDS committees of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and Beth Tzedec Synagogue. The program, Kids, Sex and AIDS, was aimed at pre-teens, teens and parents.

Johanson said she had hoped AIDS would be seen as a reason to teach sexuality in the schools "but unfortunately, we have flipped back to the dark ages and have been teaching our kids through scare tactics. Young kids who think they are invincible are not afraid of dying and AIDS education still focuses on dying and death. That information has no meaning to kids.

Important to inform kids about AIDS

"What kids really wonder about is if they can catch AIDS from a toilet seat, the signs and symptoms and how they can tell if someone has AIDS. These are the things that are not being taught in school and so it is being brought back to the parents to deal with their questions.

"When we were young we were given the 'nice girls don't' message and were told very little about sex. Those days, however, are gone and it is essential to talk with our kids. As parents, we must take back the responsibility."

Johanson said many parents would like to discuss sex and AIDS with their children but they are embarrassed and feel that they have no credibility. "It is difficult to talk and the kids certainly do not encourage it. They think we do not have the information and the truth is, we don't. How many parents know a lot about AIDS?

"What is important to know about the AIDS virus is that it dies on exposure to things such as heat, light, air, soap, disinfectant or rubbing alcohol. A great [amount] of the virus is needed to cause an infection and it is not easy to get, unless people are involved in high risk behavior.

"Kids are taught that the AIDS virus is spread through bodily fluids and when they think of fluids, they think of tears, nasal secretions and saliva. There is almost no way AIDS can be spread that way. Almost two litres of these fluids would have to be injected into the bloodstream to cause an infection. As well, AIDS will not be spread through kissing, hugging, or sharing dishes, towels or bedding. The big problem is sex, and that is what we must talk to our kids about. They must understand intercourse."

Children should be taught about sex in the context of loving, sharing and relating, said Johanson. "The message should be that sex is best within a loving relationship and the only guarantee ... is having no sex at all or being in a monogamous relationship. Other than that, the best we can do is [have] safer sex.

"Kids must know that if they are going to have sex, they must wear condoms. There is no choice and no negotiations. I would like to see condoms handed out in school so kids can open them and get a sense of what they are about. I am not giving permission for them to use condoms, but I am telling them something they need to know. It is the survival kit of the '90s and they must be aware."

In an anonymous, written question period after the lecture, Johanson was asked how to comfort someone who has been diagnosed with AIDS.

"Be there and comfort them. Let them talk, accompany them to the doctor and above all, do not talk about it with anyone else. Just be a friend," she said.

Synagogues offer AIDS programs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A smattering of Toronto synagogues run AIDS educational and outreach programs aimed at the Jewish community.

Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee sponsors a community outreach program designed to be responsive and sensitive to the Jewish community and culture. Its goals include building awareness and understanding of HIV/AIDS and of the people living with the virus while welcoming those who have AIDS into a safe Jewish environment.

Among its outreach programs are the AIDS seder, a Passover celebration for those affected by HIV/AIDS, which will be held this year on April 9; educational programs including public discussions and forums; talks in religious schools; a memorial service for those who have died of AIDS and a fundraising walkathon for AIDS, called From All Walks of Life.

For more information call the AIDS committee, 789-3291.

The Beth David AIDS committee, headed by Brian Stein, began two years ago as an offshoot of the synagogue's adult education department. Its mandate is information. The committee's first event, a forum, featured physicians, a mother who lost her child to AIDS and an AIDS patient.

The Beth David and Beth Tzedec AIDS committees recently cosponsored a program featuring radio and television personality Sue Johanson. Hundreds of people ranging in age from 11 to 70 attended the event in which Johanson focused on the roles of parents, pre-teens and teens.

A March 26 lecture by Dr. Mitchell Cohen will address sex and ethics — sexual decision making and Jewish values. Call 633-5500 for more information.

Beth Tzedec's AIDS committee, chaired by Roslyn Verny, also focuses on information. Its first event in 1994 was a forum featuring physicians, AIDS patients and a mother who lost a child to AIDS.

The general community is welcome to sit on the committee. To attend an AIDS committee meeting call 781-3511.

Breaking silence on family abuse

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — We tend to think of our Jewish communities as warm, loving, close-knit families sheltered from the abuse and family violence that takes place "out there," in the wider world. That is not the true picture, says Lynne Orech-Wener.

"Fourteen of 31 cases one Winnipeg Jewish Child and Family Services counsellor is currently dealing with involves family abuse in some form," Orech-Wener recently told a small gathering at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue. "The Jewish community has to break the silence."

The Winnipeg social worker was the keynote speaker for Not In My House ... Not In My Community, a series of five workshops on consecutive days organized by the Commitment To A Caring Community Committee.

The committee was created two years ago as the educational arm of a community crisis reaction team. The crisis team, in turn, was formed as a result of a number of suicides within the Jewish community. Previous seminars and workshops the committee has organized include a dialogue with Winnipeg Jewish gays and lesbians and their parents; safety and gangs; a program on dating; alcohol, drugs and lifestyles; and a presentation on Jewish community norms.

Although Orech-Wener had no data relating specifically to abuse within the Winnipeg Jewish community, she cited numerous statistics that demonstrated a growing level of abuse and violence in society against spouses, children, women and seniors.

Vancouver's Jewish community has developed a crisis line for abused Jewish women while a Winnipeg shelter has set aside a kosher kitchen, she added.

"Statistics show that [from] one-in-five to one-in-10 Jewish women are victims of emotional, physical or sexual abuse. Because we don't want to accept that it happens within our families or communities, Jewish women stay in abusive relationships twice as long as non-Jewish women. If no one in the Jewish community is willing to concede that this sort of thing happens, where is the woman to turn?" she said.

Jewish victims of abuse are reluctant to go to Jewish professionals for fear that their plight will become known in the community. In the case of children of Holocaust survivors, they may feel their pain cannot compare to that of their parents, leading them to remain silent. There are also economic factors that keep an abused Jewish woman within a marriage, Orech-Wener said.

Use of religious symbols causes mixed feelings

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The controversy over the use of religious symbols in Remembrance Day services in Winnipeg School Division No. 1 continues to reverberate, leaving mixed feelings within this city's Jewish community.

The issue was first raised by a Jewish teacher in the public school system who was disturbed by the proliferation of crosses at Remembrance Day services in her school. As a result of her letter, representatives of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) and the Manitoba Islamic Association approached the school board about including other religious symbols for Remembrance Day services in schools.

While the Jewish and Islamic representatives framed the issue in positive terms by urging the inclusion of other religious symbols, media headlines and open line radio shows interpreted the matter as a rejection of crosses in the schools. As a result, Winnipeg's Jewish community would seem to be divided on the issue.

Several Jewish Winnipeggers who were questioned declined to comment. Others said that they hadn't been paying much attention to the matter.

Philip Weiss strongly disagrees with any attempt to remove crosses from the schools' Remembrance Day services. "This has left a bitter taste in the mouths of many Jews," says the Holocaust survivor and educator. "All religious symbols should be included."

Jack Goodman, president of the largely Jewish General Monash branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, says his members have no problem with the crosses. "Our relations with the other Legion branches have always been cordial and friendly," he notes. "We attend all the parades displaying our Magen Davids. We don't want to rock any boats or create anti-Semitism."

"My sense is that the disagreements within our community are the result of the way the media has played up the issue rather than dealing directly with the facts as presented to the school board," says Evelyn Hecht, the WJCC's director of community relations.

The Jewish war veterans, she notes, have voiced their objections to any tinkering with Remembrance Day. "We are not suggesting they change their observances or associations with other veterans in any way.

"We have been accused of wanting to change Remembrance Day. That's ridiculous. We are staying focused on the issue to do strictly with the Winnipeg No. 1 School Board," she said.

Finestone in the wrong department at wrong time

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Five days short of her 69th birthday last month, Sheila Finestone was dumped from the cabinet, losing her job as secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women.

She is one of only three Jews in the Commons, and the only one from Quebec. During the Mulroney years Finestone achieved political fame as a tireless, informed cultural affairs critic, time and again putting the Tory government's feet to the fire on major issues.

When the Liberals came to power in 1993, she fully expected to be given the cultural affairs portfolio she coveted. Instead she got multiculturalism and status of women. She made it clear that she wasn't happy. It wasn't the job she felt she deserved.

The culture portfolio went to Michel Dupuy, who made a mess of everything he touched until he was turfed out of cabinet last month.

Finestone, helpless to do anything about Dupuy's bumbling, went from cheerful and tireless to snappish and listless in her junior ministry. She never developed the closeness to the professional ethnics in the multicultural communities; or the contacts to feminists required in her job.

Important women's groups such as NAC, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, complained privately that she was moody and temperamental.

She made powerful enemies and few friends around the cabinet table. She found herself on the outs with people around Alfonso Gagliano, a Chrétien loyalist, and powerful backroom cabinet minister. They blamed her, unfairly, for a leak to La Presse about Gagliano having been the accountant for a prominent Montreal organized crime personality. They were wrong. The leak came from inside the Montreal police force, not from Finestone's people.

Finestone was in the wrong department at the wrong time. For a Liberal government obsessed with the deficit and foreign trade, multicultural and women's issues were not a priority.

She failed to make her mark, or publicize the impact on women and visible minorities of legislation and political initiatives by other ministers dealing with race relations, crimes against women, poverty and joblessness.

She was caught by the Reform Party using a government chauffeur and limousine to get home to Montreal and back on weekends. She replied that she needed a limo since she couldn't ride trains, because she had thrown her back out washing a floor.

Not particularly known for generosity, the Reformers replied that the help must have been away that day in Westmount.

During this time, Finestone, who is the daughter of the late, great Jewish community leader Monroe Abbey and his wife Minnie, and is also related to the Harold Cummings family in Montreal, had to deal with the continuing illness of her husband Alan, which only made her job in Ottawa more trying. Politics have never been easy on family life.

Sheila Finestone

Finestone has continued to have the respect and support of her constituents in her riding, Mount Royal, the safest Liberal seat in the country. In the last general election, she won the greatest majority of any Liberal MP.

Backroom Liberals want Maldoff

Now, the backroom Liberals want Finestone out so they can run their latest catch in her riding, and bring him into the cabinet. He's the talented and articulate Montreal lawyer Eric Maldoff, a friend of Chrétien's special advisor Eddie Goldenberg, and a member of the Montreal Jewish gang around Chrétien that includes policy and research director Chaviva Hosek, and outside special consultant David Zussman.

The Senate is not a possibility for Finestone because the only Quebec Senate opening went last week to MP Shirley Maheu, and the Liberals can now run their new cabinet star, Stephane Dion, in Maheu's safe St. Laurent Cartierville riding.

Maldoff, fluently bilingual and an expert on minority language issues, is desperately needed right now. He would become the second Jew in cabinet.

The Liberal backroom tradition calls for two Jews in cabinet, one from Ontario (they've already got Herb Gray from Windsor) and one from Quebec (which was Finestone.)

So far they haven't offered Finestone anything interesting in return for leaving. Until they do, the feisty Finestone will be on the government benches.

Jewish schools prepare for hockey tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Four Jewish day schools that have added boy's hockey to their list of extra-curricular activities will play their first-ever round robin tournament on Feb. 19 at Forest Hill Arena.

Bialik, United Synagogue Day School (USDS) Bayview, USDS Bathurst and Associated North are the four schools participating in the venture's inaugural season, said Ron Lindzon, whose son, Daniel, is a Grade 6 student at Bialik.

The round robin will be the highlight of the season with games played for Jewish day school supremacy under the watchful eyes of sanctioned refs. The boys will be treated to a kosher pizza lunch and will have the opportunity to socialize with their counterparts from other Jewish schools, Lindzon said.

The tournament might also serve as the forerunner for an annual event that organizers hope will attract the participation of other Jewish schools, he added.

In fact, Lindzon said he, Don Mintz and Jeff Krupski, the other Bialik hockey "builders," along with their counterparts from the other schools, are seeking the support of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and Jewish schools for a day school league.

In a letter to the BJE's Rabbi Irwin Witty, parents from the four schools ask "for your endorsement as our governing body. Having such an endorsement will ... aid in the establishment of a day school hockey league with ... a coordinated schedule for our teams, a common system of organization within each school and finally an established route for new school participants to ... establish new teams."

The league would enhance community cohesiveness and spirit, while allowing young people to enjoy sports and friendly competition, the letter states.

This season, the four teams have been arranging their own exhibition games against other schools, as well as gearing up for the round robin event, which will be held on a professional development (PD) day.

Bialik has played exhibition games against Upper Canada College (UCC), the Avenue Road Selects (a community team), North Prep and Allenby School. They defeated Avenue Road 17-5, shut out North Prep 9-0 and outlasted Allenby 8-3 but lost to UCC by a 7-3 margin.

In other action, USDS Bayview, which has many Metro Toronto Hockey League (MTHL) Minor Atom players on its roster, defeated Hillcrest Atom Selects 8-3.

Lindzon said he came up with the idea for a Bialik team last year when Daniel, who plays for Hillcrest Atom AA, "came to me and asked, 'Why couldn't my school have a team when his friends did?' "

Last January, Bialik principal Uri Korn gave Lindzon, Mintz, whose son Evan is in Grade 6, and Krupski, the school's gym teacher, the green light to form a team. Tryouts were held and the team selected from among the school's grades 4, 5 and 6 students.

Parents at other schools heard about it and similar efforts were undertaken there.

When the boys of Bialik heard they were going to have a team, they could barely contain their enthusiasm. You could hear comments like, "This is the best day of my life. Now I get to play with my friends," Lindzon recalled.

Maccabi Ontario making itself more accessible

TORONTO— The Ontario region of Maccabi Canada is back with a new attitude, a new enthusiasm and, a new address.

The move is part of an ongoing effort to make the Jewish sports organization more accessible to the public, whether prospective athletes, financial contributors or potential volunteers, said Maccabi spokesman David Phillips.

Those wishing to contact the Jewish sports organization can do so at the following address:

MACCABI CANADA (Ontario Region)
2300 Yonge Street
P.O. Box 67030
Toronto, Ontario
M4P 1E0

Alternatively, the Ontario Maccabi organization can be reached by telephone at: (416) 480-2346.

Red Fisher has seen all there is to see of the Habs

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For 41 years, Red Fisher has covered every aspect and angle of a legendary hockey team called the Montreal Canadiens.

So long, in fact, that he plans to keep on doing it till he drops.

At 69, Fisher, speaking recently to a luncheon of the Jewish Business Network, was every bit the sportswriter straight out of central casting. He was knowing, jaded, cynical and funny, scriptless but never at a loss for words, regaling the crowd with biting anecdotes and gems from a sportswriter's unsentimental bag of bon mots.

At his age and experience, Red doesn't care and Red doesn't have to. He's seen it all, done it all, and written about it all, including 17 Stanley Cups by Les Habitants.

He still goes regularly on road-trips, to practice, keeps his eyes and ears open, and meets 20-minute deadlines dozens of times a season.

There is, of course, the accumulated wisdom according to Red. Call it Fisher's little Red book.

Today's hockey players?

"Overpaid, overpampered, and too many of them."

Tearful at seeing the venerable old Montreal Forum, a veritable shrine, see its last?

"It's a building," says he. "The Forum didn't make the team. The people who wear the [Canadiens] sweaters make the team."

And what about that La Presse story last year about Fisher trying to influence five anglophone Canadiens to get coach Jacques Demers fired?

"I was the only one trying to get Jacques Demers fired," pleads Fisher.

The proverbial question, "What's a nice Jewish boy doing in the sportswriting business?" is the easiest query of the day, maybe because Red asked it himself.

"The fact is," says Fisher, "that I always wanted to be, since I was nine or ten."

What could be a greater career, thought he, as he pored over the pages of the now defunct Montreal Herald, than getting paid to accompany the Canadiens down to spring training and to cover the team on a day-to-day basis?

Being in the "right place at the right time" helped Fisher do just that.

Fisher moved his way up from The Monitor and the weekly (and also defunct) Montreal Standard to the Montreal Star.

His first game was a memorable one: the infamous Maurice Richard riot on March 17, 1955, at the Forum.

When Fisher called the city desk in the midst of the melee that spilled into the streets to tell them to send a reporter down, he recalled, he was told to "circulate in the crowd."

Fisher opted instead for survival, and talked his way back into the Forum.

"It was a terrible night," he says with perfected deadpan, "but that's why I love this business."

Fisher's most thrilling memory?

"By far," he says, Paul Henderson's series-winning goal for Team Canada against the Soviets in 1972, when he put the stick "right up their butts."

Israel reluctant to approve no-calorie synthetic fat

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Health Ministry will not rush to approve the use of olestra, the synthetic, zero-calorie fat that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approved for use in potato chips and other snacks after a decade of testing.

Dr. Brian Coussin, head of the ministry's food service, said recently that his office will ask the FDA for more information and carefully consider the matter before agreeing to the import of snack foods with olestra or their manufacture here.

"FDA approval does not automatically mean we will approve it," the food technologist said. So far, no local company has applied to use the artificial fat.

The synthetic chemical, made of sugar and vegetable oil, consists of large molecules made of six to eight fatty acids that enzymes can break apart and that pass through the intestines without being absorbed.

Unlike other fat substitutes, it doesn't break down at high temperatures, so food can be fried in olestra. Twenty-eight grams of regular potato chips have 10 grams of fat and 150 calories, but the same amount of olestra chips have no fat and just 60 calories.

U.S. sales of olestra are expected to reach $1 billion soon and could top $100 billion if approved for use in other foods.

Scientists at Procter and Gamble, the U.S. food giant, have been working on olestra since the late '50s and patented it in 1971. The company applied to the FDA to approve it as a food additive in 1987, but the supervisory organization delayed because of its unpleasant and perhaps harmful side effects in some people.

According to the FDA, eating foods with olestra can cause deficiencies of oil-soluble vitamins like A, D, E and K.

Health experiences among sexes differ, says psychiatrist

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The health experiences of women differ from those of men, at all ages and in all societies, according to an Australian psychiatrist.

Lorraine Dennerstein, a professor of public health and community medicine at the University of Melbourne and the director of the university's Key Centre for Women's Health, recently addressed some 130 supporters of the Weizmann Institute of Science on the topic of global issues in women's health.

Dennerstein is the co-author/editor of 19 books and 200 papers on women's health issues and a consultant for the World Health Organization on human reproduction.

She said women's health issues have been given more attention in the last 20 years and there are more medical interventions geared specifically to women than in the past, but women's health remains a low priority in many Third World countries.

"The general consensus is that women's health is a matter primarily concerning women, rather than an issue affected by men's attitudes, behaviors and decision-making powers," she said.

"Women's experience of health is currently dependent upon many exterior factors which women themselves are powerless to change without the support of men."

Women in developing countries tend to be disadvantaged socio-economically at every stage of their lives and their health suffers accordingly, she said.

In some African and Asian countries where girls are not valued, sex selective abortions and infanticide are practised. Thirteen developing countries report higher mortality rates among female than male children aged one to four, she said.

A female child's health, survival and education is determined by the value placed on women in her culture and the family she grows up in, Dennerstein said.

Furthermore, marriage and child-bearing at young age exposes females to increased health risks. By the age of 15, 18 percent of Asian and 16 percent of African girls are married.

Illness connected to pregnancy and delivery is the most significant health problem among women age 15 to 44 in Third World countries, and while many women may want to limit the number of children they bear, such family planning decisions necessitate the cooperation of their male partners, Dennerstein said.

Sexually transmitted disease — in Africa exposure to HIV/AIDS is prevalent — is the second most serious problem among these women, who often don't get proper treatment because they are embarrassed or don't have access to medical attention, she reported.

The lecture was organized by Weizmann Women for Science and the Women's Health Committee of the University of Toronto.

Conference to explore medical ethics

SAN FRANCISCO, Calif. — The seventh Annual International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics is scheduled to take place Feb. 16 to 19 in San Francisco.

Woman thinks she's melting

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A 28-year-old Israeli woman is one of the few people in the world to be diagnosed with a strange, but usually short-lived psychiatric syndrome that caused her to believe the world and parts of her body were "melting" and that she would live forever.

The rare illness, called Cotard Syndrome, is so obscure that it is not even listed in the the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders - considered the psychiatrists' bible. Fewer than 20 cases have been authenticated. The case is described in the latest issue of Harefuah, the journal of The Israel Medical Association, by Drs. George Simovici and Arye Bauer of the Jaffa Community Mental Health Centre.

The woman is unmarried and an only child who completed only elementary school. She lives in sheltered housing and works in a factory.

Complaining of anxiety, she suddenly claimed witches had cast a spell on her; when she looked in the mirror, she saw herself without a nose. A computerized scan of her head showed physiological changes in her brain.

She was treated with drugs and psychotherapy and her condition improved.

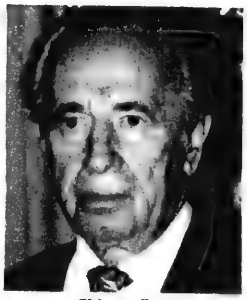
Peres promises referendum on Golan

By DOUGLAS DAVIS AND SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Shimon Peres has committed himself to holding a referendum on withdrawal from the Golan, if an accord with Syria is reached after early elections.

Addressing a news conference in London last Thursday, Peres said he would not take the results of early elections as a mandate for territorial concessions on the Golan.

Earlier, after declaring that he would decide this month whether to call early elections, Peres, appearing on the BBC's current affairs program Newsnight, brushed aside suggestions that by calling early elections he might be perceived as "cashing in" on the wave of support for Labor following the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.



Shimon Peres

At the news conference, held toward the end of a two-day visit to Britain, Peres said he would prefer to see the government continue until its term ends in late October, but "there are some considerations, not connected with the peace process," which incline him to early elections.

"We have to have a new mandate because this government exists as a result of a tragic event," he said. "Just as a bullet cannot stop the democratic process, it cannot justify an extension of the mandate

"There are other unspecified economic and political considerations" which might make early elections necessary, he said.

Interior Minister Haim Ramon said that while Peres "may want an early mandate, he also does not wish to slow down the negotiations with the Syrians."

The final decision about the Golan, he said, should "in any case be subjected to a referendum, regardless of when elections take place. There are many people who would like to see Peres as prime minister but who have a problem on the issue of the Golan. Why should we stop these people from voting for Peres? This can be done if we let them have a separate say on the Golan in a referendum."

The Golan Residents Committee last Thursday night called for a law to ensure that a referendum on the Golan will be held regardless of elections.

"We are demanding that a Golan referendum law be passed by the present Knesset to ensure that the promise made by Peres is not just a trick designed to help him win a quick election, then reach a speedy agreement with the Syrians," said committee spokesperson Uri Heitner.

Nazi goods sold in China

By LORI SILBERMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – A Beijing business that was selling Nazi paraphernalia was shut down by Chinese police.

A broadcast on Chinese state television last Monday announced the police action.

German diplomats in Beijing, commenting on the broadcast, said that Nazi revivalism was virtually unheard of in China.

"This is worrying," one diplomat reportedly said Tuesday.

"This must mean there is a wider problem or they [the government] would not be reporting it so widely. They would be keeping it quiet."

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress, said in an interview that the announcement was significant because it indicates that renewed Jewish and Israeli contact with China "has heightened China's sensitivity" to this matter.

In the past, such an incident would have been ignored, he added.

The broadcast, noting that Jan. 27 was the 51st anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camp at Auschwitz, began by saying Germany had proclaimed Jan. 27 "a day to reflect on the persecution of Nazism," in order to teach future generations not to forget history's lessons.

It then provided a list of the Nazi paraphernalia available at the store, including gas masks, helmets and clothing, and badges and medals with the Nazi swastika – "everything but weapons," according to the broadcast.

The report did not say, however, who was behind the operation or if it had links to neo-Nazi groups.

Israel , PLO jockey for control of Jerusalem

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Final status talks on Jerusalem are not due to begin until May, but jockeying for control of this ethnically and religiously diverse city is well under way, pitting Israel against its negotiating partner in the Oslo peace process, the PLO.

The latest skirmish of this running battle took place last month as Palestinians in the territories went to the polls to elect an interim self-governing council with limited powers.

Along with the Palestinians of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the Arab residents of East Jerusalem — annexed by Israel but claimed by the PLO as its future capital — were permitted to cast ballots. They voted for seven candidates who would represent them in the 88-seat legislative council.

But from the moment the Knesset passed special legislation transforming five post offices in East Jerusalem into temporary polling stations, controversy flared.

The Jewish mayor of Jerusalem, Ehud Olmert, described the arrangement as a ploy "to undermine Israel and the Jewish people's sovereignty over its eternal and undivided capital."

The Palestinians complained that Israeli police and soldiers had interfered with campaigning, and that the five polling booths could only accommodate a fraction of Jerusalem's voters.

But once the votes were counted, the Palestinians had won a small victory. With Israel's reluctant acquiescence, they had elected legislators who would represent their interests in their sector of Jerusalem.

Was it, as one Likud parliamentarian suggested, "the beginning of the dividing" of Jerusalem?

Perhaps.

As far as the Israeli government is concerned, no such thing happened. Israel regards Jerusalem, all of it, as its eternal and indivisible capital.

In the wake of the Six Day War, the Knesset passed a law extending the city's municipal boundaries beyond the Green Line. In 1980, the Knesset enacted legislation affirming Jerusalem's status as Israel's capital.

Two years ago, Israeli parliamentarians decreed that the Palestine National Authority (PNA) — which administers the Palestinian autonomous areas — cannot conduct official business in Jerusalem.

Furthermore, Israeli leaders have laid claim to Jerusalem's hinterland. For example, Prime Minister Shimon Peres has reportedly assured the mayor of Ma'aleh Adumim that it will remain part of Israel in any agreement with the Palestinians. Ma'aleh Adumim, the largest Jewish settlement in the West Bank, lies close to Jerusalem.

Be that as it may, the Palestinians have pressed their own claims to Jerusalem. Yasser Arafat, head of the PLO and president of the new Palestinian council, has repeatedly asserted that Jerusalem belongs to the Palestinians. By that, he means East Jerusalem. The PNA recognizes West Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

To bolster their title to East Jerusalem, the Palestinians have taken a number of steps which, Israel claims, contravene the letter and spirit of the Oslo accords:

- They have taken control of the private school system in eastern Jerusalem while leaving the old Jordanian administration intact to appease Israel. Olmert believes the takeover threatens Israeli authority in Jerusalem.
- Against Israel's wishes, the Palestinians have revived the Arab Jerusalem Municipal Council, which Israel broke up in June 1967. It is uncertain whether the council still holds regular meetings.
- Last month, the PNA appointed a "governor of Jerusalem." Olmert called the appointment "a provocation."

Most of all, tension has arisen over the functioning of Palestinian offices in East Jerusalem.

When he was foreign minister, Peres said Israel would recognize and preserve Palestinian institutions of an economic, social, educational and cultural nature, provided they were not directly linked with the PNA.

Since then, there have been a series of disputes over this matter. Last summer, Israel closed, then reopened, the Palestinian Health Centre, the Palestinian Broadcasting Authority and the Palestinian Statistics Centre.

Orient House, the PLO's de facto headquarters in Jerusalem, has also caused problems.

In contravention of Israeli wishes, more than 40 foreign officials, including Canadians, have visited Orient House in the past two years. Notwithstanding pleas by Olmert, Israel has no plans to close it.

Jan. 29

- Foreign Minister Ehud Barak said he opposes allowing the United States to offer proposals that would narrow the gap with Syria in an effort to reach a peace accord this year. "I think the best way is for both sides to reach it by themselves," Barak said.

Jan. 30

- A bill that would allow minors to carry out AIDS tests without their parents' permission unanimously passed first reading in the Knesset.

- The government committee on Israel-Diaspora relations declared in its first meeting that Israel still has a role in offering "spiritual" rescue to world Jewry.

- Prime Minister Shimon Peres called on Israel's moderate Arab neighbors to form a coalition against fundamentalist Islamic nations and groups that threaten "taking the world backwards 500 years."

Jan. 31:

- Two Palestinian police officers were caught in a stolen car near Ramallah, the same day the Palestinian police in Hebron returned to Israel 73 stolen cars located in areas under their authority.

- Some 2.5 million tourists arrived in 1995, a record year for tourism, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced.

Feb. 1:

- Mohammed Rajib Salameh Mohammed, a Palestinian academic arrested on suspicion that he spied for Iran, was expelled to Jordan. Security sources said Mohammed, 44, caused no damage to national security.

Feb. 3:

- Palestinian police raided a house in the Shati refugee camp near Gaza City and killed two Islamic Jihad activists who had apparently refused to surrender, camp residents said. Israeli media said the two men were involved in planning the Beit Lid double bombing that killed 20 soldiers and a civilian one year ago. Sources in Gaza said the two were suspected of planning attacks against Israelis to avenge the killing of Jihad leader Fathi Shkaki in Malta three months ago.

Christopher seeks to advance stalled Israel/Syria talks

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jewish Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher arrived here Sunday night in yet another attempt to advance peace with Syria, though chances for a breakthrough are fading, given the prospects of early elections here, diplomatic sources said.

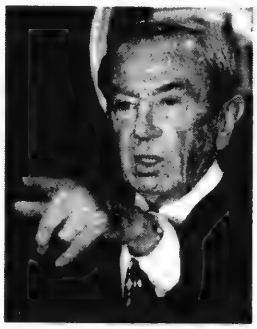
There are indications that Christopher realizes the Syria-Israel talks will be low priority until after the elections are over, they said.

"It is fair to say that if there are early elections in Israel, peace talks will continue, but the tough decisions on issues such as security arrangements will only be made after the elections are over," an American diplomatic source said.

Both Israel and Syria seem to prefer that talks continue so as to preserve some momentum.

"We still have no signs that the Syrians are willing to compromise on a few issues that are critical to us and if they don't show any compromise there won't be any peace," said Minister Yossi Beilin.

"There is room for working groups to start more extensive talks on all issues on the agenda, but I don't think there is reason to expect a breakthrough," Beilin told Israel Radio.



Warren Christopher

While the United States may not be pleased by the prospect of early elections, Christopher is not seeking to press Prime Minister Shimon Peres on the matter. In a phone call last week, sources said, Christopher noted the calling of early elections is an Israeli matter.

Yet, it is important to Christopher that he not be blamed by Israeli officials for failing to deliver an early breakthrough this week, and therefore be perceived as the immediate trigger for early elections, the American diplomatic source said. Christopher is slated to leave the region on Thursday, and Peres said he would make his announcement about early elections by next week.

State-run Radio Damascus expressed disappointment with the progress in Maryland. Syrian radio attacked Foreign Minister Ehud Barak as being uninterested in doing what is needed for peace. Barak said recently that he would not give a drop of water on the Golan to Syria.

American diplomatic sources were doubtful that Hafez al-Assad would agree to a "photo-op" with Peres before the elections, which might bolster Peres domestically. They said Assad will continue to link any meeting with Peres to a prior commitment to fully withdraw from the Golan.

Before meeting Peres, Christopher will participate in a Yad Vashem ceremony for an American Righteous Among the Nations, Darian Fry.

Radical right distancing itself from extremism: prof.

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Israel's radical right has become much more moderate since the murder of Yitzhak Rabin, says a Hebrew University expert.

"The right wing has gone through an enormous change, distancing itself from extremism," says Prof. Ehud Sprinzak, author of the Ascendance of Israel's Radical Right.

"There is still a small core of a few dozen individuals who are capable of assassination. But even extremists need a sense of communal approval in order to act. With the change in public mood on the right, these extremists find themselves isolated."

Sprinzak would not speculate on the likelihood of another political assassination. But he said two factors could drive extremists to the brink: increased Arab terrorism or evacuation of the settlements.

"Such a heightened level of conflict could lead to another assassination," he told The CJN.

Speaking earlier at a symposium at Bar Ilan University, Sprinzak dismissed the commonly heard view that right-wing ideology had led to Rabin's murder.

"The Oslo accord was a threat to the dream of a greater Israel. But that is not what drove people to the streets. It was Arab terror that led to the radicalization of the right."

Wave of terror

Sprinzak maintains that until late 1993, pragmatism characterized the right-wing and settlement movement.

"For many, living in the territories was a way of realizing a bourgeois dream. What led the pragmatists to close ranks with the extremists was the wave of terror," says Sprinzak, citing a series of murderous attacks against settlers and soldiers in November and December of 1993.

"The right wing became radical not because of ideology, but because people began to worry about the safety of their children."

In the aftermath of Rabin's assassination, the settlement movement has adopted a much more moderate stance, said Sprinzak, noting that last week the Council of Settlements of Judea and Samaria decided to rally behind Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

"The fact that settlement leaders have opted for the parliamentary approach is significant," said Sprinzak. "A year ago, they were trying to bring down the government by taking to the streets. This marks an enormous change."

But Sprinzak warned that Arab terror could radicalize the right again. "Terrorist attacks could set the machine in motion. It could mobilize people to take to the streets again. We may see renewed efforts to delegitimize the government by blaming it for terrorism."

Tsomet had in past campaigns nibbled into Labor's support, and it is not clear whether its potential electorate would fully follow it into a partnership with the Likud, and whether those with a Labor past would vote for a Likud-led list.

News of the deal may also cause internal problems in Likud, where the primary race for safe slots on the Knesset list is very crowded.

At this point, no one knows where the Tsomet candidates will be placed and how far down on the list the Tsomet newcomers would push the very hard-pressed Likud contestants.

Tsomet had already finished putting its own list of candidates together, the first party to do so.

Meanwhile, the consensus in the Labor party is that Peres has made a decision on early elections and will make an announcement shortly.

But Peres told Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal and Labor Knesset whip Ra'anan Cohen he prefers the line that he has not yet decided. Presumably this is done in order to deny a tie between the decision and U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher's visit.

The word in Labor is that Peres will meet with Netanyahu this week to give him the official word, to ask for Likud cooperation in passing legislation to dissolve the Knesset, and to find a mutually agreeable election date.

Netanyahu said his party does not oppose rescheduling the elections, but that he is awaiting word from Labor.

According to Cohen, the dates now contemplated for the elections are May 14, 21 or 28.

Peres told Shahal that "announcing early elections now would be too early and doing so after mid-February will be too late."

Cohen was to confer with his Likud counterpart MK Moshe Katsav to begin the traditional haggling about an election date.

Meanwhile, practical preparations for early elections were underway in Labor headquarters. These include advancing the party's Knesset primaries once again. They were already moved back from June to April 17, and the talk now is about moving them to March 26, the day the Likud had long ago slated for its primaries.

Party secretary-general Nissim Zvilli has ordered generous overtime allotments to insure that the bureaucratic groundwork for the primaries is completed by an earlier than envisioned target date.

Early elections fever, however, extends beyond the primaries. There is already hectic activity to prepare the infrastructure for the campaign itself. Shahal is seen as managing Peres's campaign for prime minister, while Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer is likely to be put in charge of the Knesset campaign. Labor sources claim that Interior Minister Haim Ramon will be heading the party's "information drive."

"Everything is all ready for the race. All that is needed now is the firing of the starting pistol," Cohen said Sunday night.

MDA director goes to court

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Tel Aviv's Labor Court issued a temporary restraining order Sunday barring any change in status for Magen David Adom (MDA) blood services director Dr. Amnon Ben-David. The case will be discussed with both sides present at a future date.

The order, sought by Ben-David's lawyers Uzi Atzmon and Dan Ahiezer, cut short discussions by MDA's board of directors about proposed sanctions against Ben-David, who four years ago approved his predecessor's decision not to use most blood donated by Ethiopian immigrants or to inform them that their blood was likely to be destroyed.

Atzmon said that dismissing or suspending an employee for the reasons given by Health Minister Ephraim Sneh, who last week asked MDA director-general Amos Luria to suspend Ben-David, was "without precedent." Before the court order was issued, Luria appeared before the 11-member board in Tel Aviv and asked that it approve putting Ben-David on a forced vacation until the Navon Commission reaches its conclusions on the blood donor affair.

Sneh said he would wait for the court to reach its final decision. If it decides to permanently bar any sanctions against Ben-David, Sneh said, he would honor this decision.

The Israel Medical Association and the Israel Hematology Society voiced their full support for Ben-David, saying his decision not to use most blood donated by Ethiopian immigrants because their risk of HIV was 50 times that of the general population and because lab tests could not discover all carriers was correct.

His decision not to inform immigrant donors that their blood would not be used (except for rare types, which were frozen and the donors later retested) was aimed at protecting the Ethiopian immigrant community from stigmatization by the general public, they said in a statement.

As the 11-member MDA board deliberated, dozens of blood services workers demonstrated in the building in support of Ben-David, and eight Ethiopian immigrants protested below to demand Ben-David's dismissal. The board asked MDA legal adviser Ami Osnat to prepare the organization's response to the court order and ask for the go-ahead to send Ben-David on forced vacation. The board also issued a statement rejecting claims that MDA had acted in a "racist" or "anti-Semitic" way.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres Sunday night officially appointed former president Yitzhak Navon as head of the commission of inquiry into the Ethiopian blood donations affair.

Meanwhile, the Unified Ethiopian Immigrants Organization withdrew its petition to the High Court of Justice against Magen David Adom's refusal to use blood donations from Ethiopian immigrants.

The court was scheduled to hear the case Tuesday.

Terror suspect caught

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israeli security forces this week apprehended a wanted member of the Islamic Jihad movement at the Rafah Crossing separating the Gaza Strip from Egypt.

The man, arrested Sunday as he was trying to flee to Egypt, was reportedly suspected of involvement in the Jan. 22, 1995, Beit Lid and April 9, 1995, Kfar Darom terrorist attacks.

At least 27 people, including American student Alisa Flatow, were killed in the two attacks.

The apprehension came in the wake of the arrest the previous night of two other members of the fundamentalist group by Palestinian police.

The two were arrested in the Shati refugee camp in the Gaza Strip, and are suspected of involvement in a terrorist attack in Gaza.

The two arrests were made shortly after Palestinian police killed two members of the Islamic Jihad in a shootout in the Shati camp.

The two were also wanted by Israel for involvement in the Beit Lid bombing. Last month, a member of Islamic Jihad detained by Israel's domestic security service confessed to planning the Beit Lid attack.

During Sunday's funeral for the two, followers of Islamic Jihad, which violently opposes the Israeli-Palestinian accords, vowed to kill Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

PANFINANCIAL: LEADING EDGE FINANCIAL IDEAS

We live in very unusual economic times. Interest rates are at a 30 year low. The stock market is at an all-time high. Real estate values have plummeted and taxes are astronomically high, as are the Canadian unemployment rates. All this adds up to a complicated financial environment.

How do you set a plan for financial security today and into the future? Where do you turn for strong, steady and certain growth for your hard-earned RRSP and investment dollars? What strategies can you employ to reduce the arduous burden of ever increasing taxes? Are there any new, innovative, "leading edge" ideas that can help you build wealth and reduce taxes?

The answers to all of these perplexing financial questions can be found at Canada's leading personal financial services company. The Panfinancial Group of Companies has provided "leading edge" financial ideas to members of Toronto's Jewish community for the past quarter century. The partners of Panfinancial have designed many products, services and approaches that have allowed thousands of Canadians to build personal wealth faster and safer with far less of a tax burden.

At their monthly Toronto seminars for accountants, they share their latest innovations in RRSP management, estate building, financial risk reduction and tax saving strategies. Best of all, there is no cost to meet with them and tap their vast wealth of knowledge.

Gordon Berger, Nathan Disenhouse, Zale Newman and Jack Pollak are the senior partners in the Panfinancial Group which is compromised of Panfinancial, PKNS Insurance and Financial Services and Matt Financial. Each division has its own area of expertise and innovation, including RRSP management, tax-sheltered savings and the safest tax shelters, as well as innovative and unique approaches to life and disability insurance issues.

Their conservative investment strategies, highly personalized approach and sound scientific assessments of all the financial opportunities available provide great comfort to clients and their professional advisors.

While Panfinancial represents virtually every major insurance and financial services company in Canada, they really represent you, not any particular company. Using five different computer programs they measure the stability and performance of more than 1200 mutual funds and 500 insurance products to provide you with the most consistent performers in every category of investment.

In today's uncertain environment the most prudent strategy is to have a sophisticated financial advisor diversify your financial holdings into various types of investments such as mutual funds, bonds, GIC's and government backed securities.

As well, your holdings should be diversified geographically by having foreign investments in places such as the U.S., Europe and the Far East as well as here in Canada. Finally, an excellent strategy is to diversify by company and by management style. This means having a number of peak performing managers oversee their share of your investments. Examples are Fidelity Investments, North America's most popular and successful family of funds as well as Dynamic, Trimark, Templeton, Mackenzie and Elliott & Page.

The key is to have one experienced and innovative financial advisor oversee your entire program. The partners of Panfinancial continuously measure which companies consistently perform the best in each particular area of investment. They recommend the right balance of investments that should go into each area and update you as the financial situation develops and changes. They will educate you, make it easy for you to understand and give you a sense of comfort that you are heading along a sound financial route.

Finally, they will work with your professional advisors to make your investments creditor-proof and recommend strategies that will allow you to pay the absolute least amount of taxes possible.

At the Panfinancial Group, they are so confident in their ability to provide "leading edge" financial solutions that they promise to show you significant wealth building and tax saving strategies that you have never heard before or they will donate $500.00 to the charity of your choice.

A secure, independent future

To maintain personal and family security and enjoy greater independence, more women are studying finance and investment. In the investment world as anywhere else, you command more respect and make wiser decisions when you have background knowledge.

To provide this knowledge, State of Israel Bonds Women's Division presents a seminar: "Everything You Wanted to Know About Investing ... But Didn't Know Who to Ask", co-chaired by independent commodities trader Jody Samuels Silver, and Jordana Enig Stockhamer, Barrister and Solicitor. Stockhamer says:

"Today's women have to take responsibility for their own financial welfare. Women have traditionally relied on their husbands to control their finances. One of the mandates adopted by the Israel Bonds Women's Division is to educate women about proper financial security, and the importance of Israel Bonds in their portfolios."

Keynote speaker is Anne MacLean, a partner at Goodman & Company. MacLean has gained wide knowledge of American stock markets as an investment analyst and portfolio manager.

The seminar is on Tues., Feb. 20, at the Primrose Club, 273 St. Clair Ave. W., beginning with lunch at noon (dietary laws observed). Couvert $15.00; to reserve a seat, please call (416) 789-3351.

The process of creating wealth

It seems that most Canadians lack a coherent investment strategy. This is evidenced by the fact that investors have been simultaneously demanding fixed income products such as GICs and tax-assisted products such as venture capital funds.

There is an inherent contradiction in adopting a strategy using these products to create wealth. GICs provide security of principal and guaranteed investment returns, but these same returns are fully taxable if placed outside an RRSP. In contrast, venture capital funds provide substantial tax benefits but are speculative investments lacking security of principal or returns. When you consider that most Canadians hold the majority of their wealth outside sheltered plans, these contradicting needs become a serious problem.

Most investors take a short-term perspective when seeking investment security. The desire to protect investment principal takes precedence over the need to maximize net worth over the long term. The opportunity cost of this focus can be substantial.

The creation of a clearly defined investment strategy will focus on the specific needs and future goals of each individual investor. This is of paramount importance in properly designing an investment portfolio.

Working with a financial adviser who not only understands investment opportunities, but more importantly, understands what's important to you, will develop a process which over time, will create wealth ... for you.

For information on developing and implementing a financial strategy which will achieve those goals important to you, call Allan Kalin of Financial Growth Associates at (416) 491-4046.

The evolution of investment strategy

My goodness that sounds heavy! It really isn't, and if you take 3 minutes we might just make you a STAR, at least from an investment perspective.

Years ago, most people became investors through direct investment. While a few became wealthy, others suffered losses. Although everyone knew not to "put all their eggs in one basket," diversification required far more cash than most of us had. Thankfully, someone invented mutual funds.

Mutual funds permitted people to pool their money, then hire a professional manager to choose better investments. This achieved diversification, better yields and lower costs. The results speak loudly. By 1995, $146 billion was invested in 1100 mutual funds, in Canada alone. But, with so many funds and wide swings in year-to-year returns, investors are often frustrated.

A solution is now available. It is now possible to have excellent returns over time without suffering the wild fluctuations that are typical of the best performers. A scientifically designed portfolio of funds can reduce the fluctuations that many people find so upsetting. Based on a NOBEL PRIZE winner's work, the asset allocation model uses several funds that act to offset each other. The theory is that not all markets will move in the same direction or with the same momentum. By combining the right mix of funds an investor can achieve excellent results with much less volatility.

The solution is called STAR! There are 16 different portfolios to suit every individual need. It has the attention and approval of people like Gordon Pape who calls it the "winner by a wide margin." It is also highly recommended by SHERR, BERGSTEIN & CRACKOWER. For information on this latest development in investment strategy, call us today. Let us make you a "STAR".

DISPELLING THE MYTHS OF REVERSE MORTGAGES!

The public is exposed to a tremendous amount of misinformation about the reverse mortgage according to Carol Christopherson, Vice President of the Canadian Home Income Plan™ (CHIPS™).

"Obviously that's frustrating for us as the creators of the program, but more importantly it is unfair on consumers," says Christopherson. "If someone who could truly benefit from the reverse mortgage doesn't do it because they have been given the wrong information, they may end up compromising their retirement lifestyle quite unnecessarily."

Carol Christopherson
V.P. Canadian Home Income Plan

According to Christopherson the wrong information often comes from sources that should know better. "Bankers, lawyers and financial planners are three of the groups, that think they know about reverse mortgages because they work in related fields, but I have yet to meet one who has the true picture. It's not that they mean to mislead anyone its just that they often jump to conclusions without knowing the full story."

The reverse mortgage was designed by the Canadian Home Income Plan™ Corporation in 1986 to provide Canadians over the age of 60 with a unique financial opportunity. Through CHIP™ they were able to access some of the substantial equity that had built up in their homes. Over the past eight years, thousands of eligible homeowners have taken advantage of the program to enhance their lifestyles and assist their children with financial goals. Because the home represents the majority of assets for retirees, unlocking a portion of its value to provide a desired lifestyle appears to make a lot of sense.

The amount of equity that can be taken is based on age and can be received all as cash, if there is a specific need, all as monthly income, or as a combination of both. This enables the individual to tailor the program to their own needs and provide the financial freedom they desire. The most popular uses of CHIP™ can be grouped under the category of "Lifestyle." Vacations, home renovations or a new car would all fit in here along with home help which could be anything from a gardner once a month to a 24-hour-a-day nursing care.

What's important for people to realize is that this is not a program of last resort or one that only fits for a low income group," says Christopherson. "We have many quite wealthy people who use this program for financial and estate planning,"

One of the reasons for this is that the monthly income created through CHIP™ allows interest income to be received on a non-taxable basis (while the mortgage is still in place) through a tax ruling won in 1987. This opens up some interesting tax planning opportunities as well as the ability to pass a portion of the children's inheritance to them at an earlier date when they are probably more in need.

CHIP™ is known as a reverse mortgage because no repayments are required on the capital advanced during the homeowner's lifetime. Instead, the principal plus interest is repaid all at once from the estate. This leaves the homeowner to enjoy the full benefits during their lifetime knowing that it does not require repayment until they die. Both the mortgage component and the income option (if that is chosen) are guaranteed to continue for the homeowners lifetime providing security to the homeowner.

Security has been an extremely important concern to the Canadian Home Income Plan™ Corporation and they have taken many steps to ensure total security to the homeowner. Not the least of which is the stipulation requiring all applicants to review the legal documents with their lawyer before they are allowed to enter CHIP™ – that certainly provides a great deal of peace of mind.

If security is number one on the people's list then flexibility is a close second. CHIP™ is aware of this and has designed their reverse mortgage to provide full flexibility to move at any time, repay the mortgage at any time or even rent the property should that become necessary. They have really worked to understand their target market and develop a product to fit its needs.

"Our primary objective at CHIP™ is to educate people about the CHIP™ reverse mortgage. Retired people have spent many hours learning about RRSP options, annuities, mutual funds, Government benefits and other retirement income options, they owe it to themselves to invest a little time learning about CHIP™. "

CHIP™ can be reached at 487-2447 for an information package and for details on upcoming seminars, or, by writing to Canadian Home Income Plan™ Corporation, 700-1881 Yonge

One of the most beneficial ways to maximize your investment return is to ensure that you utilize the foreign content portion of your RRSP.

Foreign investment provides you the opportunity to invest in the United States and emerging markets as well as offering portfolio diversification and provides an excellent hedge against the Canadian dollar. Up to 20% of the value of your self-directed RRSP can be invested in qualified foreign securities. Investment in foreign securities is a very effective way of managing your investment portfolio and State of Israel Bonds offer many attractive instruments to maximize your foreign content.

By utilizing the foreign content portion of your RRSP, you will not only benefit from the advantages outlined above, but you will also have the advantage of having your investment grow tax free!

Israel has one of the industrial world's highest rates of growth and its workforce is the most highly educated in the world. This unique combination has allowed Israel to establish itself as a country with an economy that offers the benefits of exceptional growth — a feature associated with most developing countries. However, as a result of Israel's highly developed infrastructure, the volatility that usually co-exists with rapid growth in developing economies is minimized. The infrastructure, made up of highways, oil terminals, ports, pipelines and water carriers has been financed and developed over many years by funds raised through State of Israel Bonds.

State of Israel Bonds offer many attractive instruments: By purchasing the Zero Coupon Bond, you can turn $3,199 U.S. into $6,000 U.S. on January 31, 2006 which results in an effective yield of 6.5%. The Canadian Floating Rate Issue Bond, which pays interest based on Canadian prime rate less 0.75% adjusted quarterly, currently yields 6.75% and can be purchased in units of $5,000 CDN. Another consideration may be the Individual Variable Rate Issue Bond, which is based on 5% plus half the difference between 5% and U.S. prime, adjusted semi-annually and currently yields 6.875%.

State of Israel Bonds are offered through Canada-Israel Securities Ltd. or through your financial institution. Simply advise your financial advisor that you wish to purchase bonds or contact your local bonds office.

Actress' roles help her discover her Native roots

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Daughter of an Israeli father and an Ojibwa mother, actress Jennifer Podemski, 22, admits, "I honestly didn't do much discovering of my native side until I began getting the roles I was getting."

Life in the Wilson-Bathurst neighborhood of North York, where the former student at the Claude Watson School of Arts school grew up, is nothing like the Saskatchewan reservation where many of her relatives on her mother's side live.

"All my friends were Jewish. I went to a Zionist camp for 11 years, and that's all I knew," says Podemski, who speaks Hebrew and has visited Israel often.

Playing the lead role of Sadie Maracle in Bruce MacDonald's acclaimed 1993 film Dance Me Outside, which is set on a reservation, was an educational experience for Podemski. Last fall, she expanded on the role during filming of The Rez, a six-part TV series due to begin airing soon on the CBC television network.

Based on a character created by writer W.P. Kinsella, Sadie Maracle is a tough-willed contemporary young woman who is "a wicked character," says Podemski. "She knows what she wants and she gets it.

"I had to make it extra believable when preparing for that role, because I have no personal experience with a character like that."

Podemski began acting at age 12 when she appeared in Once Upon A Mattress at the Adath Israel synagogue. After several acting jobs for CBC-TV, she studied dance at the Koffler Dance Studio and then switched to theatre because "I discovered that I liked my theatre classes more than my dancing classes."

She also played the role of the teenager Pique in the CBC's two-part production of The Diviners, based on Margaret Lawrence's classic novel, which first aired in 1992.

Mixed heritage

"It was a perfect role for me, being of mixed heritage," says Podemski, who acknowledges that she is in danger of being typecast because of that same mixed heritage.

In Israel recently, she was offered a part in an Israeli film, playing "someone who was half Israeli and half something else," she says. However, she was obliged to turn down the role, since she had already enrolled in the year-long acting program at the Vancouver Film School that began in January.

The differences between the Jewish and native Canadian peoples are vast, notes Podemski, observing that one is stereotypically a "have" and the other a "have-not" community. "One is perceived as a very wealthy and powerful group that will succeed, and the other as the opposite of that."

But she also acknowledges a gruesome likeness. "Both have struggled for thousands of years with genocide," she observes. She is one of relatively few people who can refer credibly to the Holocaust and the infamous Battle of Wounded Knee in a single sentence.

It's a time of expanding awareness for Podemski, as she attempts to reconcile the differing halves of her heritage. "It's a bit confusing," she admits. "I'm still trying to figure it out."

Successful show a real cottage industry

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you're in the market for a cottage or you want to fix up the one you own, consider visiting the 1996 Cottage Show at the West Annex Building at Exhibition Place from Feb. 9 to Feb. 11.

One of the reasons to visit the Cottage Show is "to find a great deal" on a cottage and/or property, says Cottage Show director, Ron Cowan. "In today's economy it's a total buyer's market ... You can buy tremendous cottages under $100,000 on a lake two hours from Toronto."

The show is Cowan's brainchild. He came up with the idea in 1989 after the cottage he'd been renting rose 40 per cent in value during one year of the real estate boom. He decided to jump on the bandwagon and invest in his own vacation property.

Although he was a real estate agent at the time, purchasing a cottage was uncharted territory for Cowan. He looked at prefab houses for $29,000 but that price was just for the wood; it didn't include the cost of assembly or of installing a septic system, he said.

He discovered that to get a septic system installed, a road would have to be built; if there were problems on the lot, the septic system could set the purchaser back a further $20,000.

Cowan, 33, found the huge range in cottage prices confusing and he realized that if he, a real estate agent, was stymied by the cottage market, the average consumer would have difficulty as well.

That experience sparked the idea for a Cottage Show — a place where realtors from cottage regions like Parry Sound, Muskoka and the Kawarthas could show their wares. It would also provide a place for comsumers to do comparative shopping under one roof, he explained.

He broadened the concept to include a range of products and services geared for cottagers, from winterizing and building cottages to furnishing them.

The Cottage Show, now in its sixth year, has grown to 200 exhibitors from 105 and it attracts some 20,000 people.

The show shifted to Exhibition Place after five years in Pickering. Cowan had approached the CNE about renting space back in 1989, but he was turned down because CNE management considered him too young and inexperienced, he said.

He then linked up with the late Henry Wittenberg, an experienced show manager, who liked the Cottage Show concept. Wittenberg took care of the administrative end of business while Cowan concentrated on sales. The partnership lasted until Wittenberg's untimely death in 1993.

Business Briefs

ITALIANS TO DISCUSS DEAD SEA INVESTMENT

JERUSALEM –Vice- president of Italian holding company IRI, Roberto Tama, is due to arrive here within two weeks to discuss a planned $20 million (US) investment in the Dead Sea.

A visiting delegation of medical and business experts representing the region of Lombardy in northern Italy signed agreements last week for cooperation in business with Dead Sea Laboratories, manufacturers of Ahava products.

The delegation is headed by Dr. Alberto Calibretti, who is the deputy health minister of Lombardy.

Representatives of Lombardy's San Rocco spa and members of the Lombardy regional government also signed agreements with the Tamar regional council for development of a spa near the Dead Sea.

Joint research will be conducted to examine cooperative health tourism ventures and medical research.

Dead Sea Laboratories vice president Dan Benihu said the initial agreement includes distribution of Ahava products in Italy and the establishment of an Ahava Spa at San Rocco.

GIDEON HOLDINGS TO BUY SHARE IN ELITE

JERUSALEM — Gideon Holdings, the Strauss family's investment company, will purchase a 15 percent share in Elite Industries for about $22 million (US), after negotiations between Elite and Clal Industries broke down.

The shares are part of the 25 percent stake Federman acquired from the British Man company and will be purchased at the same price paid to Man.

Recently the Federman group - which includes Elite chairman and general manager David Federman, his father and his brother - bought Man's 25 percent of the controlling shares and 12 percent of the share capital for $44 million.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Group of Seven: The Art Gallery of Ontario celebrates the 75th anniversary of this famed and highly distinctive school of Canadian painters with an ambitious, multi-faceted exhibition of historical and contemporary Canadian artists, along with talks, films, live music and other activities.

Adults, $12.50. Feb. 16 to May 5. 416-872-3333 or 1-800-461-3333.

Jewish Film: On Feb. 11, the Toronto Jewish Film Society presents Ernst Lubitsch's classic World War II black comedy To Be or Not to Be (U.S., 1942), a witty satire in which Jack Benny and Carole Lombard are members of an acting troupe trapped behind enemy lines.

The same evening, the society is also screening The Yiddish Gauchos (U.S., 1989), an entertaining 30-minute documentary about the Jews who fled the pogroms of Eastern Europe in the last century, settled in Argentina, and gave birth to the Jewish cowboy known as the Gaucho.

Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall. Tickets (for both films) are $7 at the door, and go on sale at 7:15 p.m.; the films begin 7:30 p.m. Bill Emery, 416-924-6211.

In My Father's Court: He was five years old in 1935 when his father left him and his mother in Warsaw to go to America, and he did not see him again for two decades. By then, Israel Zamir had fought in Israel's war of independence and labored on a socialist Zionist kibbutz. His father, the celebrated writer Isaac Bashevis Singer, had toiled in the literary vineyards of late 19th- and 20th-century Jewish life in both the old world and the new, and established his reputation as one of the finest of Yiddish writers.

Despite the huge discontinuity in the father-son relationship, Zamir, whose name translates as Singer in Hebrew, has continued a family tradition by writing a memoir, Journey to My Father, Isaac Bashevis Singer (Arcade Publishing, U.S. $21.95). In it, the son paints a less-than-flattering picture of a man obsessed with literary creation and relations with women to the detriment of family life.

Still, the son seemed to benefit from eventually getting to know his Nobel Prize-winning father, and even translating some of his books. "In Journey to My Father, the son shows he has absorbed his father's conviction that 'brevity advances the plot, whereas a burden of descriptions renders it heavy'," wrote Rodger Kamenetz in a review in the New York Times.

Jewish Music Toronto: This organization kicks off its new season with a program of Jewish music and music by Jewish composers, featuring Offenbach, Meyerbeer, Milhaud, Copland, Weinzweig and Srul Irving Glick.

The music will be played by the North York Symphony in the George Weston Recital Hall, under the baton of maestro Kerry Stratton, at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts. Feb. 29, 8 p.m. Tickets are $28. Joan Tooke, Koffler Gallery, 416-636-2145.

The Baker's Wife: The Canadian premiere of this charming musical play is based on the 1935 film, La Femme de Boulanger, by Marcel Pagnol and Jean Giono. Set in a town in rural Provence in the 1930s, the story tells of the town's baker, who is inconsolable and cannot bake after his wife runs off with another man. The village is thrown into chaos, and the villagers must examine all their petty differences, old grudges and nursed resentments to solve the crisis.

Joseph Stein (Fiddler on the Roof) wrote the book and Stephen Schwartz (Godspell, Pocahontas) wrote the music and lyrics about 20 years ago. For artistic reasons the show never opened on Broadway but director Trevor Nunn mounted a London production in 1989.

An Equity Showcase Theatre production, The Baker's Wife features 19 characters and 19 musical numbers. It previews Feb. 14 and plays from Thursday Feb. 15 to Saturday Feb 24, nightly except Sunday at 7:30 p.m. at the Studio Theatre, Harbourfront. Recommended minimum donation for admission is $6. Donations for Daily Bread Food Bank invited. 416-532-8178.

Judy Loman

In Brief: Judy Loman, one of Canada's premiere harpists, offers a spellbinding evening of solo classical music Feb. 20 at 8 p.m. on stage at the Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. W., Toronto. 416-205-5555.

Show examines health issues

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Joyce Resin, host of CBC's Alive, is committed to telling a story that is not often told.

Her four-year-old show, which airs from Vancouver on Sundays at 11:30 a.m., focuses on a new definition of health that recognizes the influence of families, communities and environment on a person's total well-being.

"Our mandate is to examine the full range of health issues, from fitness and exercise to workplace safety, healthy eating, alternative therapies, native approaches to healing, handling stress, teen problems and sex. Stories focus on solutions — individual, community and corporate responses to health concerns," said Resin in Toronto recently.

Resin said when she hosted CBC's The Best Years, aimed at people over 50, it became clear to her that the older people who were happy and healthy were generally those connected to the community.

"It had little to do with diet and more to do with being involved and having a legitimate role to play in society. I began to understand that health is a lot broader than medical issues — it has to do with being active, interested and maintaining close contact with family and friends."

Resin, wife, mother of two teenage girls and part-time aerobics instructor, said that in the western provinces, there is a tremendous movement towards alternative medicine and spirituality.

"People want control of their health. Over the next little while, more and more people will become aware that attitudes, emotions and the way we handle stress have a great impact on our health. Someone may do all the right things as far as their physical health goes, but as well, they must have a positive attitude.

Joyce Resin

"This year's season premiere focused on how anger can kill people. New studies show that anger can threaten health with cancer and heart disease. What we did was to show how expressing anger can make a difference to well-being."

The show is aimed at everyone, she said, although most viewers are female. "Men are not as comfortable in dealing with health issues — they do not talk about themselves as much as women, they are often into macho issues. Some men are starting to get interested in health matters, however, and we are starting to see a breakthrough.

"More and more teens are watching as well," she added, "and we get a lot of mail from boys and girls concerned about such things as their weight, smoking and self-image. We enjoy getting feedback from them because although the show is for parents, it does feature many teen concerns. Issues such as teen suicide, unhealthy school environments and Hepatitis C are all of interest to teenagers."

A story Resin took to heart was one on teenage smoking.

"The bulk of new smokers are teenage girls. So we found a 17-year-old girl who committed on-camera to quit smoking. We gave her a small video camera to record her challenge and she kept a diary about the concerns. She was worried about putting on weight. Being thin was critical to her. We're proud to say that she has kept in touch with us and to this day has not had a cigarette. We feel like we had a direct influence on her life," Resin said.

Alive is co-produced by Resin and Paddy Moore and is a co-production of CBC British Columbia and Vive Communications Inc. Sponsors include Health Canada, Ontario Ministry of Health, B.C. Ministry of Health, Saskatchewan Health, New Brunswick Department of Health, VanCity Savings and Connaught Laboratories.

Singer's Yiddish repertoire mirrors composers' emotions

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Theresa Tova it isn't as simple as belting out the Yiddish songs which flowed to Broadway.

Her repertoire is to fashion a program which mirrors all the joy and anguish of the Yiddish composers, to be faithful to the spirit of the people who were the source of the music.

She sang Yiddish favorites such as Harbst Lid and Avreyml (with lyrical translations by Hindy Nosek-Abelson), counterpointing them with hard-luck songs of the 1930s--Brother Can You Spare a Dime and My Buddy.

Obviously she touched a nerve connecting the Yiddish roots and North American experience of the audience, linking Ashkenazi culture to popular music of this era.

For example, she sang the first verse of Vi Shlekht an Vi Bitter and with no break in tempo or mood switched to her own English translation, beginning: "I come from Jewish stock, My blood boils good and hot."

She captured the audacious bravado of Mordecai Gebertig's Avreyml in Yiddish and its English translation for the New World which begins: "I steal from cheapskates, stingy sons of bitches ..."

Can you imagine Tova swinging Puttin on the Ritz by Irving Berlin at the same time as talented co-performer Liza Balkan, is singing Molly Picon's Yidl Mitn Fidl? It worked, thanks as well to the clever arrangements by musical director John Alcorn.

This number is from Still the Night, a musical to be workshopped in the spring based on the recollections of a young girl in the Polish underground.

In every sense, Tova, a Calgary native who is the daughter of a survivor, is a magnetic stage personality who involves the audience in her own life.

She recounted with delight her love of singing Under Dayne Vayse Shtern by Avrum Sutskever (Under Your White Starry Heaven) to non-Jewish audiences in Toronto clubs in the last two years. As she did in those venues, she adds the English translation by Nosek-Abelson, which begins: "Under your white starry heaven, touch me with your pure white hand."

Tova's mode of singing Yiddish songs may be too saucy and naughty for some traditionalists but she is definitely a high-voltage performer for the '90s.

Dictionary volume issued

TORONTO – Local scholar and author, David Mendel Harduf, has just published the third issue of Harduf's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary.

The book comes in a soft cover, large-size, limited edition and covers the letters H-K of the English alphabet.

Besides the Hebrew equivalent of the English entries, the book carries a transliteration of each Hebrew word or phrase. This should be helpful to librarians and students alike, as they are guided from the beginning to read and pronounce each Hebrew word correctly.

The dictionary contains a basic English vocabulary, enriched by many new and up-to-date words and concepts. An impressive number of quotations from classical and modern Hebrew literature are given to illustrate the use of the Hebrew transliterations.

The book costs $58.50 and can be obtained by contacting the author at 416-663-5467.

Exploring Jewish Europe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Did you know that the British Museum in London has the original copy of the Balfour Declaration?

Did you know that the Great Synagogue in Stockholm is considered one of the most beautiful synagogue buildings in Europe?

Did you know that the Jewish cemetery in Worms, Germany, is the oldest of its kind on the European continent?

Did you know that the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw contains one of the most outstanding collections of Judaica in the world?

If you weren't aware of these relatively arcane facts, you'll find them in the second edition of A Travel Guide To Jewish Europe by Ben Frank (Pelican Publishing, $18.95 US).

Frank's 600-page compendium, replete with grainy black-and-white photographs, overflows with data about 18 countries from Austria to Turkey.

Written in a pleasing informal style, the book combines history with practical information about local sights, organizations, synagogues, kosher restaurants/cafes and museums.

Mushing with Huskies a true winter's delight

By VERA GILLMAN
Special to the CJN

TROUT CREEK, Ont. – What's a nice Jewish girl doing in a place like this? Ask the Jewish mother who thought her daughter should celebrate her "40 something" birthday mushing huskies in the middle of dog sledding country.

But just as sure as icicles will form on your eyelashes, the smile will freeze on your face as your sleigh weaves its way through the magical winter forests of the near north. Don't get me wrong. This is no sit-back-and-relax, huddle together sleigh ride. This is the true north strong and free Canadian sport of dog sledding.

Whether yelling "mush, easy, whoa, ha, gee" or just collaborating with the leader of your pack, you, your sled and your team of dogs brave whatever the trail and the elements dole out.

Maureen and Doug Groves, owners and operators of Sunvalley Dog Sledding, take the business of fun seriously.

Maureen custom plans tantalizing meals and comfortable lodging for the sledders in her home, while husband Doug, a retired military master of survival training and top dog around Sunvalley, instructs and then leads the new mushers and their dog teams.

In sledding season, November to March, the Groves are busy six days a week, their most avid customers being European tourists. Many go dog sledding over the hundreds of kilometres of trails and Crown land that surround the Groves' abode. Trips vary from a one-day sampler to staying out for two weeks at a time, with a choice of overnight lodging in the house or sleeping under the stars.

Both Maureen and Doug take part in breeding and caring for their dogs. Huskies, Siberian in particular, are work dogs, bred for running, carrying, pulling, playing and lying around in the snow. They're highly intelligent, sociable and, like most dogs, fiercely loyal to those who care for them.

The six of us, my husband and I, our two teenage sons, my sister and her fiance arrived at 9 a.m., a half hour before our scheduled departure time. The pouring rain that greeted us at our final destination some five hours north of Toronto did nothing to calm our trepidation. However, it didn't appear to dampen the spirit of the 50 huskies that dotted the hillside behind the quaint country home belonging to our hosts.

With the assurance of the most up-to-the-minute weather report, we knew that the one-degree drop in temperature necessary to change the rain to snow was imminent. In the meantime, an indoor lesson using a video of Doug taking out a previous group of urbanites was quickly taking our minds off the weather. Instead, I started to wonder whether my current exercise program had included enough weight lifting to get the job done.

Each of us was assigned to and responsible for our own dog team, usually six dogs. That meant taking these powerful animals from the multitude of dog houses scattered around the property over to our sleds and properly harnessing each one with the the appropriate size of harness. The eager canines had not run in two days, so "easy" and "whoa" became our most valuable commands.

Once out on the trail, the single most important instruction, we were told, was to stay with our team under any circumstance.

After six hours and 30 kilometres of hilly, winding, wooded, winter land, including an outdoor lunch stop complete with campfire and provisions, we arrived back at the house, spent, but not yet finished. Rubbery legs and arms notwithstanding, it was time to unharness the dogs, take them back to their separate dwellings, water, feed and pat them generously for their trouble.

Once the sleds are in motion, you still have to run up hills to relieve the pressure on the dogs, brake hard and repeat "easy, easy" each time they try to overtake the next team, concentrate on avoiding dog fights while remembering to praise yours for their efforts, and build a special rapport between you and your lead dogs.

Sounds like a lot of work. So when does the fun begin? The rewards are numerous and varied. The dogs love to run and when gravity allows, they fly down hills and around corners as you steer with your body weight. Trips are geared to the clients' wishes and capabilities. While the tireless teens stayed outside to help feed the dogs, the rest of us settled into cozy living room couches to await dinner and to allow tired muscles to stiffen. Dinner never tasted so guilt-free.

The greatest rewards – the scenery, the solitude, the thrills, the interdependence of musher and dog team and just plain fun in the freshest air you've ever breathed – all combine to etch a lasting smile onto even the most harassed city dweller's face.

Thanks mom, for the memorable birthday. Now if I could just find that gift certificate I got for a massage.

Getting a game plan key to leasing a car

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB news editor

TORONTO – Thinking of buying or leasing a car? There's lots you should know.

"Make up a shopping list and have a game plan," advises Mel Wise, co-author of Gordon Pape's 1996 Car Value Guide. "It's like playing in the Super Bowl; without a game plan you'll be lost."

Buying a car is the second most important purchase one makes, (second to buying a home) and shouldn't be done on a whim. "Sit down with your family and talk about it. Don't come home with a sports car if you have three kids and a St. Bernard," Wise said.

"You should also have an indication of what you can afford and look only in the price range you'll be comfortable in."

When dealing with salespeople – and Wise should know, he's been in the dealership business for 25 years and is currently leasing manager at Downsview Chrysler in Toronto – don't fall for their sales tactics.

"When they tell you 'It won't be here tomorrow,' that's a load of crap." Always take time to think about it, Wise said.

In the 1996 Car Value Guide, the authors rate different ranges of new cars, give helpful tips on buying new or used cars, offer maintenance tips and negotiation tips. One chapter deals with leasing cars.

The advantage to leasing is the warrranty. Most warranties, which sometimes include roadside assistance, last for the duration of the lease.

If you're looking to buy a lower-priced subcompact, Wise highly recommends the Pontiac Sunfire. "It doesn't skimp on safety features – dual airbags, ABS brakes, child-proof locks – and is the best bang for the buck."

For a higher-priced mid-size car, Wise recommends the Honda Accord or Toyota Camry. "They're very, very stable. They have great resaleability and the creature comforts are excellent."

In the chapter The Top Value Cars, the authors also highly praise the Ford Contour, the Chrysler Intrepid, Ford Probe, Mazda Miata, Lincoln Mark VIII, GMC Jimmy and the Dodge Caravan.

The book retails for $14.95. An index detailing where you could find descriptions on each listed car will be a helpful feature in any future editions.

330 OBITUARIES

DAVIS, Samuel - Husband of the late Gladys (Wiezel) Davis, passed away on Jan. 7, 1996 in Saint John, N.B. Mr. Davis was born in Saint John in 1914, the son of the late Harry and Ida (Rozovsky) Davis. He was a retired businessman and former professional engineer. Mr. Davis served as Mayor of Saint John in addition to several terms as a city councillor and had been President of Shaarei Zedek synagogue in Saint John, President of the New Brunswick Museum, Chairman of the Saint John Regional Hospital, a governor of Heritage Canada and an executive of several other voluntary boards. He earned degrees from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the University of New Brunswick. The latter awarded him an honorary doctorate in recognition of his service to the community. He is survived by sons Roy and Alan of Toronto, Gary of Saint John and Jan of Montreal, brothers Abraham and Isadore and seven grandchildren. He was predeceased by his brother Eli and sister Rose. Contributions may be made to the University of New Brunswick Foundation, Office of Development and Public Relations, P.O. Box 4400, Fredericton, N.B, E3B 5A3.

Dear Ella,

Not long ago, I was involved in a relationship with a successful businessman and consultant. Martin and I went out for a year but unfortunately (for me), it didn't work out.

During the relationship, I had introduced him to a longtime friend of mine, Adam. The two got along very well, and even developed a business relationship. Now they are good friends, which makes me uncomfortable. Whenever I get together with Adam, I end up hearing about how Martin is doing, how his personal life is. It drives me a bit batty and usually ends up ruining my day. I've asked not to hear about Martin, but I guess I can't resist the details anyway.

In the end, this has put a damper on what was otherwise a very rewarding and longstanding friendship with Adam. I get the feeling that Martin is, in part, using Adam to ensure that I hear about how great his life is without me. Help!

Frankly Miffed

Dear Frankly Miffed,

This sounds like one big game, and you are all playing the parts assigned to you, to see who can aggravate whom best.

It is clear you have not gotten over Martin. Now that you are hearing about how well he is doing without you, it's driving you crazy. Chances are you would have preferred it if Martin had fallen apart without you by his side, but people have an instinct to survive and that is exactly what Martin is doing.

I suggest that you try to do the same. Close this chapter in your life and get on with a new one.

As far as Adam is concerned, let him be. You call him a friend, yet you are using him to hang onto a fantasy.

You will be much healthier and happier when you come to terms with this breakup. It is likely that when you meet someone new to take the place of Martin, your friendship with Adam will go back to what it was and you won't care what happens in Martin's life any more.

It is a "no-win" game you are playing, so why not stop now and move on to something new.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Elections expedited

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Isreal Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres kicked off Israel's 1996 election campaign Sunday night with the announcement that he intended to hold early elections, probably at the end of May.

A majority of members of Knesset support the move, including opposition leader Binyamin Netanyahu, who has been demanding early elections since the signing of the Oslo accord.

Peres is expected to decide this week on the exact date – either May 21, May 28 or June 4 – following consultations with Netanyahu.

Speaking at a press conference, Peres described in graphic detail the night that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was murdered. He said that he had preferred not to call immediate elections because the country needed time to stabilize in the aftermath of the assassination. "The country was in shock," he said, adding that Israel has now undergone the necessary "period of stabilization."

The prime minister acknowledged that the pace of negotiations with Syria was a major factor in his decision. Originally Peres wanted to delay elections as long as possible in order to make headway in the peace talks. But on Sunday night he admitted that the negotiations required more time than he had anticipated. "I decided that negotiations with Syria should not be held under the pressure of elections." But Peres added that peace talks would not come to a halt during the campaign and repeated his pledge to hold a referendum on any agreement reached with Syria.

The election was originally scheduled for October 29, but Peres said he would hold it "at the earliest date permissible by law" – which is three months after the Knesset dissolves itself. "A long election campaign... is a waste of time and resources at public expense," he said.

The prime minister vowed that his party would "show restraint" during the campaign, and said he hoped the opposition would do the same. "There must be no return to the terrible charges of 'treachery' and 'murderer,'" he said, alluding to the accusations leveled at Rabin by rightwing opponents. "We will prove to the whole world that Israel can return to itself even after this terrible murder and show that it is a strong country and a true democracy."

Presenting himself as Rabin's heir, Peres said he would continue "the path launched by Yitzhak." Acknowledging the groundswell of support from Israeli youth in the New envoy to Canada?

JERUSALEM — Israeli press reported last week that David Sultan, currently envoy to Egypt, will be Israel's next ambassador to Canada.

Eli Yerushalmi, Israel's acting ambassador, told The CJN that the naming of Sultan is unofficial.

Sultan has been tapped by the Foreign Ministry as the next ambassador to Canada but the appointment has to be confirmed by the government.

Prior to serving as Israel's ambassador to Egypt, Sultan was the number two person at the Cairo embassy. He has also served as consul general in Milan and at Israel's embassy in The Hague. As well, Sultan was assistant deputy minister for Middle East affairs in the Foreign Ministry.

Mission 3000 set to launch

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Canada's largest-ever mission to Israel, 1996 Mission 3000, from Feb. 19 to 28, will take over 1,000 Canadians to the Jewish state – 60 percent of them for the first time.

Two jumbo jets will fly a record 1,120 people to Israel – 620 from Montreal, 360 from Toronto, 53 from Winnipeg, 26 from Edmonton, 24 from Calgary and the remainder from the rest of Canada – on a whirlwind tour that will include briefings by Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

Described as logistically unprecedented, the mission is organized by United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA), Canadian Jewish federations and Keren Hayesod in Israel, and takes place in conjunction with festivities marking Jerusalem's 3000th birthday.

According to UIA, special emphasis has been placed on those who have never been to Israel. As a result, about 60 percent of participants will be first-time visitors or those who haven't been in 20 years, including families, couples and singles.

"This is the largest operation we have ever undertaken," UIA Canada president Harvey Wolfe said in a statement. "It shows the tremendous identification of Canadian Jewry with Israel."

In Israel, 25 buses will be deployed to transport the Canadians to northern Galilee, Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, the Negev and other stops, including Yitzhak Rabin's gravesite. Scheduled on the trip's first night is a pick-up ice hockey game between Canadians and Israelis at the Canada Centre complex in Metulla. The idea is to travel the entire length of Israel, from the northernmost point to Eilat.

Touted as the mission's highlight will be a Feb. 22 dinner hosted by Peres and Olmert, to be followed by a presentation depicting Canadian projects in Israel through the Project Renewal and Partnership 2000 programs.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Education Foundation

VAUGHAN — The Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto is launching a Jewish-Russian Education Foundation to enable the children of needy Russian-Jewish families to attend educational programs, the afternoon school, day care and youth activities.

This foundation will be launched on Feb. 22 at the Paradise Banquet Hall and Convention Centre in the City of Vaughan.

Youth Violence Forum

REGINA — Regina Hadassah-WIZO in cooperation with the Regina Crime Prevention Commission will hold a community forum on youth violence on Feb. 21.

The forum, Break the Silence of Violence, includes a day-long session of presentations and workshops for approximately 150 high school students from across Regina.

There is also an evening forum and trade fair open to the public.

ISRAEL

Planting Trees

JERUSALEM— Hundreds of thousands of trees were planted in public ceremonies last week, as Israelis marked Tu b'Shvat, the traditional new year for trees.

President Ezer Weizman, Environment Minister Yossi Sarid and Jewish Agency Chair Avraham Burg were on hand Feb. 5, at the official tree-planting ceremony of the Jewish National Fund in the Jerusalem Forest near Neve Ilan.

Much of the forest was destroyed in a fire last summer.

Some 100,000 saplings have since been planted.

Peres Wins Mock Elections

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres and the left-wing bloc won a sweeping victory in the mock elections at Ramat Gan's Blich High School.

Peres received 61 percent of the votes in the elections for prime minister, compared with Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu's 39 percent, while the left-wing bloc received 56 percent of the votes and the right-wing bloc 38 percent.

In the votes for individual parties, Labor received 46 percent, the Likud-Tsomet list 36 percent, Meretz 10 percent, the Third Way six percent and Moledet two percent.

Covenant Change Urged

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher met with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza last week, pressing him to make his regime more democratic and to change the Palestinian Covenant.

The sweetener was another $2.7 million in U.S. aid.

Arafat is leaning towards canceling the charter and replacing it with a new constitution outlining Palestinian aspirations for the final-status talks, including much of the rhetoric in the interim government law now being formulated.

Toxic Cloud Forms

JERUSALEM — A cloud of poisonous gas smothered the Ramat Hovav industrial zone south of Beersheva last week, forcing rescue crews to seal off roads to the site.

A local hospital treated 10 people who were injured after inhaling the fumes.

New Jordanian Envoy

JERUSALEM — U.S.-educated diplomat Omar Abdul-Monem Rifai has been nominated to become Jordan's second ambassador to Israel.

Rifai, 39, a Jordanian foreign ministry official and peace negotiator, would replace Marwan Muashar, who was appointed minister of information when a new Jordanian government was named earlier last week.

Eritrean leader Visits

JERUSALEM — The president of the East African nation of Eritrea made a brief visit to Israel last week, stopping over for talks with Prime Minister Shimon Peres and President Ezer Weizman before heading on to Italy.

After meeting with Peres, Eritrean President Isaias Afwerki said that the two countries would step up cooperation in the fields of medicine and agriculture.

WORLD

Yeshiva U Rep To Visit

NEW YORK — A representative of Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work in New York City will be in Canada in March to meet with students interested in enrolling in the school's summer block education plan and other programs.

Feinberg Returns Home

NEW YORK — Jay Feinberg, the 26-year-old Jewish man whose medical plight initiated an international bone marrow search, has returned to his West Orange, N.J. home in good health.

Four years after being diagnosed with leukemia in 1991, Feinberg found in Chicago a match for himself from an unidentified young woman.

Feinberg is recuperating at home and is said to have tested leukemia-free. Each day he gets stronger and doctors are optimistic that he will make a complete recovery.

LaRouche Activists

SYDNEY, Australia — Two Australian federal parliamentarians have joined Jewish community groups in a call for the government to investigate the activities of the Australian followers of U.S. extremist Lyndon LaRouche.

LaRouche's ideology combines anti-Semitism and bizarre conspiracy theories, such as the claim that Queen Elizabeth heads a drug-pushing ring.

DP Camps Reunion

NEW YORK — An International 50th anniversary reunion of former Jewish refugees who were in post-World War II Displaced Persons Camps in the western sectors of Berlin will be held on the weekend of May 17 to 19.

The event celebrates the 50th anniversary of the founding of those camps. Those camps were Schlachtensee (American sector), Tempelhof (British sector) and the third in the French sector. Also included in the reunion is the Eschwege camp in West Germany.

Jewish daycare project gets $15,000 grant

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The battle for Jewish continuity in Toronto is to be fought beginning at the crib level.

Project Sarah, which has been awarded a $15,000 grant, will train dozens of Jewish women to provide day care with Jewish content for working parents and their children from infancy to age four.

The grant is one of 15 totalling $100,000 announced Feb. 4, including the largest for $25,000 to reach unaffiliated adults.

Other grants cover a range of activities including outreach to the downtown community and to a newly revived Jewish outpost in the east-end Riverdale area, talks between kinder and bubbies and zaydes, an outreach to Russian children and several involving teenagers.

The grants are "our first few halting steps," said Les Kline, chair of the action committee for Jewish continuity of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT), which distributed the grants. Another round of grants will be announced in the spring and implemented in the fall of 1996, he added.

"We're out to reach groups beyond the centre and this funding is an expression of our optimism," said Sandra Brown, JFGT president.

The women providing day care in Project Sarah will be compensated and their training and operation supervised by professionals from Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS), Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and Jewish Vocational Services, the three sponsors of the program.

"It's an exciting concept," said Susan Jackson, action committee director. Since no home will offer day care to more than four children, government restrictions will not apply, she said.

A Taste of Judaism, sponsored by the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and Kolel, was awarded $25,000 to offer free, two-hour a week, three-week courses to unaffiliated adults in various locations in greater Toronto, covering Judaism core subjects.

In a pilot project which attracted 175 people, one-third were Jewish, one-third were interfaith couples and one-third were looking for a spiritual home, according to regional outreach coordinator Jessie Caryll. Some of those taking part want to go ahead with conversion to Judaism, she said.

The courses, to be offered in June and November, will be given by rabbis and educators and will cover all aspects of Judaism, not just the Reform approach, and will hopefully attract from 300 to 500 people, Caryll said.

The $15,000 grant to the Downtown Jewish Community Council and the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) will allow the use of Internet, e-mail and other means to attract downtowners back to their Jewish roots.

"Our first task is to get people to come through our front door," said Bloor JCC director Bill Emery.

Three grants of $7,500 each went to Parent Teen Dialogue, sponsored by B'nai Brith Youth Organization, BJC and JF&CS; You Show Me Your Israel, I'll Show You Mine, an intergenerational project sponsored by the Canada-Israel Forum and Mini-Moriah Committee; and Yiddishland Cafe, another intergenerational group featuring a once-a-month evening of Yiddish music, poetry and readings sponsored by the Workmen's Circle and its cultural committee.

Grants of $2,500 went to: Beth Jacob High School to sponsor outreach to young Russian newcomers; Thornhill Jewish Single Parents; Zionist Youth Council; Magen David, a project for 18- to 30-year-olds in Earl Bales Park; Good Fellowship Lodge and Jewish Camp Council for an intergenerational program; Jewish Genealogical Society for a beginner's guide to Jewish genealogy; Halleluya '96 steering committee for a song-writing contest whose winner will go to Israel, the object being to connect with young people through the arts; the Riverdale Jewish community; and Aish Hatorah for bringing young children and parents together in an informal setting for games and talks on Jewish parenting.

On eternity's shore

Israeli poet Yehuda Amichai once described Jerusalem as a port city on the shore of eternity. Resting in its golden harbor, one begins to understand what he meant.

Everyone meets in Jerusalem. But people don't "travel" to Jerusalem. They arrive, brought to this high place by forces they can only sense. It is a meeting place where history and hope converge, a metaphysical intersection in which human beings have sought answers to heavenly questions for 3,000 years.

Tomorrow's Jerusalem was central to the deliberations of the international media conference. Six different speakers on the subject were lined up for us on the very first day of the conference.

Yitzhak Navon, a many generation Jerusalemite, and the fifth president of Israel, introduced the discussion by reminding us that since the beginning of recorded history, 36 wars have been fought in and over Jerusalem; the last war was in 1967. This significant, but little-known fact set the historical context for subsequent presentations.

Theological presentations came first. Rabbi David Rosen, director of interfaith relations with the Anti-Defamation League in Jerusalem, spoke about the need to find understanding, cooperation and accommodation among the three monotheistic religions that feel an attachment to the city, to ensure this result as the preferred outcome.

Msgr. Matthes, Charge of the Holy See, emphasized that the final resolution of Jerusalem's future must guarantee freedom of control and access to each religion's holy places.

Mithkal Natour, a lawyer practising in the Shari'a, the Islamic Court system, explained the background and the depth of Islam's claim upon Jerusalem. He did not speak about the Palestinian people's claim to the city. The distinction was by design. He put the listeners on notice that any final peace agreement must take into account Muslim sensibilities to Jerusalem.

Theological considerations then gave way to pragmatic ones. Where, if at all, could a viable solution for Jerusalem be found? Prof. Ruth Lapidot of the Faculty of Law at the Hebrew University divided the question into three components. First, she reminded, was the aspect of two competing national aspirations, Israeli and Palestinian, for sovereignty over all or part of Jerusalem. In her view it would be difficult, if not impossible to reconcile the two claims at this time. She suggested the issue be frozen, set aside, placed on the diplomatic shelf, for a period of 30 years.

The second issue she highlighted was jurisdiction over the holy places. Here too, given the number of parties involved and the highly emotional nature of the issue, she foresaw a long, arduous process of negotiation and attempted reconciliation.

Finally, she pointed out, there was the possibility that an accommodation could be explored in terms of a form of shared municipal administration of parts of the area within greater Jerusalem. While a sharp-eared listener was able to detect a degree less pessimism in her tone of voice during the discussion on this third aspect of "tomorrow's Jerusalem," one would have been hard pressed to describe her discourse as optimistic.

A different perspective was offered by Dore Gold, from the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University. Gold oozed authority and confidence. He spoke in the self-assured cadence of one completely at ease with his material and with his audience. He agreed that there cannot be a reconciliation between the two competing nationalities. He could not envision, under any circumstances, a government of Israel accepting the political redivision of the city.

He did offer, however, somewhat guardedly, a faintly encouraging remote scenario for a possible solution. According to Gold, the possibility of a solution may lie in the extent to which the claim to Jerusalem becomes more Arab and less Palestinian. Ironically, the more that the claim to Jerusalem is Islamic and pan-Arab, and less nationalistic and Palestinian, the greater the possibility, that a "solution" could be found. It would focus functionally and probably semantically on the tri-partite dimension of the religious claims upon Jerusalem. And even then, they might find a solution only after a long, wearying journey of negotiation, recrimination and finally, accommodation.

At the end of the day however, Yitzhak Navon's words rang in my ear. "Since the beginning of recorded history, 36 wars have been fought in and over Jerusalem; the last war was in 1967." May it be God's will.

Several readers called last week, in anguish and in anger, to complain about a news story in The CJN dealing with an incident in the community involving the conviction of an individual for sexually abusing a minor over whom he exercised a position of trust. The complaints were twofold: the fact of the coverage and its nature.

As I have written in these pages before, the essential, core purpose of The CJN is to serve the best interests of the community. Hiding information, however nasty and unseemly, from our readers, cannot possibly serve the community. We are a stable, resilient, mature community. We no longer recoil in embarrassment lest our neighbours think ill of the whole group for the indiscretions of one. Chilul HaShem is even greater when the individual who occasioned it is deferentially treated, shielded from the accountability he owes to his community.

Only a commitment to journalistic excellence, in the long run, is compatible with a commitment to the community. Journalistic excellence requires us to present as full a story as possible, as dispassionately as possible. Some people complained that it was unnecessary to identify the perpetrator's synagogue or where he was born. By having done so, they argued, we tarnished an entire group of people. We cannot agree.

That is not to say, however, that we must abandon decency and sensitivity in covering our stories. In this regard, The CJN may have provided excessive detail of the criminal behavior for which the individual was convicted. Given the opportunity to rewrite the article, we may have omitted nine words which perhaps cast too florid a light on the charges. In retrospect, they added nothing to the essential story.

I conclude by quoting Gary Rosenblatt, editor and publisher of the the Jewish Week of New York. I have referred to him before in this column as the pre-eminent editor of the North American Anglo-Jewish press. "The line between journalistic integrity and Jewish responsibility will always be thin. But the Torah teaches us that the ultimate test is not perception or public relations. It is the truth."

Ben-Ari expands WZO duties to Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — New York-based Gad Ben-Ari, who became chair of the Zionist Delegation in the United States and executive vice-president of the Jewish Agency, American section in 1994, is now serving Canada as well.

With an amended title to reflect his new responsibilities, Ben-Ari has taken on the duties formerly held by Herzl Makov, whose term as World Zionist Organization (WZO) representative to Canada ended last fall. Makov had been working out of the Canadian Zionist Federation's national office in Montreal.

Gad Ben-Ari

Canada had its own shaliach) are no reflection on the CZF, nor on its Youth and Hechalutz department, which coordinates Israel summer trips, he explained. The recent change was in part a cost-cutting measure, he said.

"Here in Canada you have a good operation," he said during a recent visit which included meetings with Jewish community leaders in both Montreal and Toronto.

In the United States, however, the American Zionist Youth Federation (AZYF), Youth and Hechalutz counterpart, was closed late last year, following an announcement by the Joint Authority for Jewish Zionist Education, the Israel-based umbrella for Youth and Hechalutz.

The authority had decided to deal instead with an as-yet unnamed consortium including the Council of Jewish Federations, the United Jewish Appeal and the Charles R. Bronfman Foundation.

The new entity, for which Charles Bronfman has committed $1 million (US) — half the budget — for each of the next five years, will handle "marketing, promotion and sales, and will encourage the Israel experience all over the United States," said Ben-Ari.

The Israel experience, the term now commonly used to describe trips to Israel for Diaspora youth, is "essential — to strengthen the link with Israel, to enhance Jewish identity and Zionist identity and to help ensure future leadership and active contributing members [of the Jewish community]," Ben-Ari stressed.

The trends reflected by the creation of the new entity — community cooperation and the stress on facilitating the Israel experience — certainly affect Canada, but the CZF's Youth and Hechalutz department will not go the way of the AZYF, Ben-Ari said. He does, however, anticipate the possibility of some "restructuring."

'Everything is changing'

Right now, he said, "everything is changing."

In Israel, discussions are under way about merging the Jewish Agency with the WZO. It is expected that plans for a merger or a redefined relationship will be formalized at the December 1997 Zionist Congress.

"There's already an understanding that the basis of the [Israel-Diaspora] partnership in the Jewish Agency will be totally changed," said Ben-Ari. Segments of Israeli society which traditionally have not been involved, such as business, academia, the rabbinate, youth movements and associations for olim, will be invited to join, as will their Diaspora counterparts.

Ben-Ari made it clear, however, that anyone who thinks the Jewish Agency's traditional role (of saving Jews from other countries) is obsolete is deluding himself. By the end of the year 60,000 new olim will have come to Israel from the former Soviet Union. It is expected that an additional half million will join them by the end of the century.

Campaign launched to help the homeless

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jonathan Meltz, a 26-year-old college student, is organizing a drive in the Jewish community to get blankets, sleeping bags, clothes and food to street people.

"In this cold and wet weather we must help the homeless who, for one reason or another, live on the street instead of going to a homeless shelter," said Meltz, an advertsing design student at the International Academy of Merchandising and Design.

He has arranged for blankets and sleeping bags to be dropped off at any Metro Police Station and for these items, boots, hats, gloves and scarves and canned goods, to be given to Anishanwbe Help, a native group that distributes items to street people on a non-denominational basis.

Meltz said he will use his own car to pick up donations from anyone who can't get to the other distribution points. He can be reached at 398-3997.

If any donor has a large number of items, Meltz said he can arrange to have them picked up by a van from Anishanwbe.

A member of Clanton Park Synagogue, Meltz has already visited four schools: CHAT, Mackenzie Collegiate, Or Chaim, and his own academy. All students have shown "incredible" interest in the drive, he said, but the schools are not drop-off points.

This drive is intended to last only two or three weeks, Meltz said, but even after that, people are encouraged to keep donating items to the street people.

Jerusalem play entertains, informs about the city's past

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An original play, written in honor of Jerusalem 3000, not only succeeds in condensing the city's rich history into a one-hour format, but is as entertaining as it is informative.

Featuring 35 local teenagers, the show is a joint project of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Toronto and the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF).

Our Jerusalem (Gan Yaldei Yisrael) is being presented this month at the Leah Posluns Theatre to almost 4,000 Jewish seniors and children from local Jewish schools. The greater community will have an opportunity to see it at the March 28 JNF gala launching the Jerusalem 3000 campaign and at the April 24 CZF Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations. Further presentations may also be arranged.

"We hoped for something educational and fun," said Doron Kadmiel, Toronto's JNF shaliach, whose wife Roni, also of the JNF, co-produced the play with Tami Savion of the CZF.

"They did it!" exclaimed Malka Ben-Gal, a Grade 4 Hebrew teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools.

On the way back to class, one of her students had asked about 19th-century Jewish leader Sir Moses Montefiore, who played a major role in Jerusalem's history.

Ben-Gal was delighted that the show had sparked the question. Her students will be learning more about Jerusalem in the coming months, she said.

"When we come to our material, it will be more familiar; so we will be able to do more. I think that in one hour they gave the kids more information and knowledge and love of Eretz Yisrael and Jerusalem than what we can provide in our [classroom] studies."

Tova Berle, in biblical garb, holds a gold pitcher on one shoulder as part of the play Our Jerusalem. [Clifford White photo]

The first scene alone leaves a whirl of impressions of modern-day Jerusalem — yeshivah bochers, Muslims at prayer, a street vendor selling produce from a cart and a soldier slipping a prayer between the cracks of the Kotel.

Much of the material is conveyed through song and dance, the latter choreographed by Rifka Atzmony who also wrote and directed the play. Doron Ophir served as musical director and wrote some original music for the production. Atzmony and Ophir are known for producing Toronto's Zimriyah (children's song festival).

Personages highlighted in Our Jerusalem include King David, bearing a gold sceptre; Montefiore, in his horse-drawn coach (a cleverly rejigged rickshaw); and Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, whose fight to make Hebrew a living language is depicted with humor and warmth.

"Actually, yes," said Bialik alumna Maya Shapiro, 15, when asked if the play had been educational for her.

Aaron Cohen, a 9-year-old student of Ben-Gal's, liked the special effects used in the Six Day War scene (flashing lights and dry ice smoke), but noted that a number of historical events weren't included in the show. The War of Independence was one of them, although one segment was devoted to Israel's founders.

The creators of the play strove to shed light on less familiar aspects of history, Atzmony explained.

Feminist quarterly to focus on Jewish women

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish women will be the subject — and authors — of what promises to be a particularly interesting issue of Canadian Woman Studies, a handsome feminist quarterly published by York University.

The project, slated for publication this fall, will be the first of its kind in Canada, said Naomi Black, the York University political science/women's studies professor who spearheaded the project and is still looking for contributors.

"Quite a substantial amount" has been written about American Jewish women, she added.

Canadian Woman Studies, published out of a York University office across the hall from Black's, is a 17-year-old journal which more or less recreates itself every issue when a guest editorial board pulls together a specific theme.

A small amount of grant money may be available for the upcoming issue, but most of the estimated $35,000 to $50,000 required to produce it will need to be raised, said Black.

She envisions a publication filled with individual histories, artwork, photographs and poetry depicting a wide range of Canadian Jewish women's experiences, past and present.

The six-member editorial board, itself a microcosm of Jewish diversity, is accepting submissions until March 31, but would like to be contacted as soon as possible regarding an intention to contribute.

It's not necessary to be a writer to participate, Black stressed. The editors have even agreed to process tapes for those who find it difficult to put their stories on paper. They hope to be able to use all submissions, at least in excerpted form.

Black and her co-editors — Yolande Cohen, history professor at the Université du Québec à Montréal and co-author of a history of Moroccan Jews; Frieda Forman, an organizer of both Jewish Women's Voices conferences and an editor of the Yiddish anthology Found Treasures; Toronto activist and community worker Sheila Miller; Aviva Rubin, founding member of the Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League; and Eliane Silverman, history professor and coordinator, women's studies, University of Calgary — have already sought submissions through Jewish women's organizations, over the Internet and at two women's conferences.

Now they are trying to reach women who would not have heard of the project, women whose contributions will reflect not only "chicken soup reminiscences" but also a broad range of themes.

"Even little things like, 'I remember when we came over' or 'I remember what it was like at school' or 'I had this aunt I think people should know about,' " said Black.

Among the themes the editors hope to include are immigration and migration, rural and urban women, changing ceremonies and rituals, the education of women, gender relations, lesbian and bisexual experiences, issues of social class, regions and languages, anti-Semitism, organizations, work and money, and politics.

Teens meet peers

TORONTO — In late February, 76 Israeli teenagers will set out from their homes throughout Israel to meet with their peers in dozens of communities in Europe, the United States, Canada, South America, India, China, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa.

The group is a cross section of young Israeli men and women: secular and religiously observant, sabras and immigrants to Israel from all over the world.

Three pairs of 16-year-old students will be in Canada from March 3 until April 1. One pair will be in Toronto and Western Canada, and will visit Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Who is cheating?

The charismatic premier of Quebec seems always to fall off the high road. Just when his behavior seemed to become more statesmanlike, Lucien Bouchard fell into his old familiar but disturbing pattern of dipping deep into the well of vicious, personalized invective against his political opponents.

His latest "return to form" arose during his public rebuttal of the charges levelled against him by former prime minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau. He aimed his rebutting blasts of buckshot well past Trudeau, towards Prime Minister Jean Chrétien as well. He accused the prime minister of "trying to find ways to cheat on democracy in Quebec."

However, an examination of the record of the referendum campaign and of the separatists' "loyalty" to democracy and democratic principles may tell a different, truer story about who tried to cheat on democracy in Quebec.

Bouchard chides Chrétien for equivocating about accepting a referendum result of 50 percent plus one vote in favor of the separatists. Yet did he not on the very morrow of referendum defeat declare he would never accept the result, he would never sit down at the negotiating table with the rest of Canada to discuss renewed federalism, even though a majority of Quebecers, indeed more than the 50 percent plus one vote had rejected separatism?

Did not the separatists put forward, despite former premier Jacques Parizeau's public promise to the contrary, a deliberately complicated and confusing referendum question, designed by its drafters to hide the bitter truth of a majority Yes vote? Did not the separatists constantly campaign on the specious, false promise of what they called the inevitability of an economic partnership between independent Quebec and independent Canada? Did not the separatists constantly campaign on the specious, false promise that Quebecers will be able to keep their Canadian passports in addition to the newly-engraved Quebec one? Did not the separatists campaign at the edges of an alarming xenophobia and ethnic discrimination suggesting the possibility of a backlash against non-francophones if their votes were instrumental in swinging the outcome away from the separatists' cause?

Ironically, by resorting once again to hostile and extreme rhetoric, Bouchard proves the very point made about him by Trudeau, about his use of "hateful demagoguery." He also proves that he is either conveniently forgetful or shamelessly hypocritical.

An early election

Prime Minister Shimon Peres has decided to move up the date of the Israeli elections. As of this writing, the actual date is not yet known. He has said however, that they will be held in late May or early June, at least four months ahead of the original plan of late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The early election call will likely mean that the final status talks with the Palestinians, scheduled for May, will be postponed. It will also likely mean that the decision by the Palestine National Council expected sometime in mid-April regarding the odious, genocidal clauses of their covenant will be instrumental in determining the outcome of the elections.

Peres' reasons for expediting the elections are both expedient, to take advantage of his current lead in opinion polls, and substantive, to obtain a fresh mandate for negotiating with Syria and advancing his regional economic program. We suspect though, that his chief justification was the latter. He is too experienced, too clever and too wary a politician to bank on the constancy of the voters' affections, especially in Israel. Too many potentially determinative factors hinge on outside forces. One suicide attack, one egregious campaign mistake, one preposterous Arafat remark, the failure to rescind the PNA covenant, can and probably will, affect the public's mood and electoral behavior.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Feb. 12, 1915, Lorne Greene was born. Greene was a Shakespearian actor and the chief wartime news broadcaster for CBC Radio. He may have been most remembered though, for his 14 years on TV as Pa Cartwright of Bonanza. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

In defence of Rabbi Rabinovitch

In a thoughtful article (Jan. 18) "Orthodox Jews must do some soul searching," Prof. Martin Lockshin calls into question the reaction of some segments of Orthodoxy and its rabbinic leadership to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

Unfortunately, much of his cogent criticism was misdirected against Rabbi Nachum Rabinovitch, for apparently Lockshin was misled by Israeli media reports which have consistently distorted Rabbi Rabinovitch's views and taken them out of context.

Thus Rabbi Rabinovitch never said "a person like Rabin ... is deserving to die." I myself heard Israel radio playing a clip in which he says, "He who returns the land of Israel deserves to die" (according to the Jewish law of moser) but the announcer's removal of that bald statement from its context is nothing less than scandalous. When asked on a program to define moser, the rabbi replied: "It depends on intent. Thus Prime Minister Rabin, who feels that his policies will lead to peace, is doing a mitzvah. Someone who does not share his policies and returns the land of Israel deserves to die (according to the Jewish law of moser), but in any event with the cessation of the Sandedrein, this law is no longer operative."

Lockshin, unlike myself, was not privileged to be a student of Rabbi Rabinovitch. Thus he cannot know that after the Hebron massacre, Rabbi Rabinovitch summoned the entire student body of his yeshivah and absolutely castigated Dr. Baruch Goldstein's awful act. He shredded any attempted justification and ended his address with the prophetic words, "It begins with a Jew murdering Arabs; it may end, God forbid, with a Jew killing Jews."

Rabbi Rabinovitch is a remarkably liberal interpreter of Halachah. He is on record as favoring both territorial compromise and dialogue with Arabs, as saying that Israeli soldiers must desecrate the Sabbath to provide captured terrorists with medical care, and as being firmly opposed to uprooting settlements.

He has explained his views as not being based on the idea of the sanctity of land being greater than that of life, an idea which he rejects, but on the moral obligations a government has towards its citizens. His approach is based both on his understanding of Jewish sources and on John Locke. He stated to me in a private conversation that his objections to the removal of citizens would apply to similar policies of any government throughout the world.

Why women are overlooked

I would like to make a correction to Bill Gladstone's item in his Feb. 1 "Eye on Arts."

The selections in Found Treasures: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers were chosen and edited by its four editors, Frieda Forman, Ethel Raicus, Sarah Silberstein Swartz and Margie Wolfe, only two of whom were named in the article.

Ironically, the article mentions the names of the three male patriarchs at Yiddish literature and goes on to name the male editors of a 1954 best-selling anthology of Yiddish literature, yet fails to mention the names of the four editors, the 14 translators and the 18 writers of the stories, all of whom are female.

Though I'm sure this was an unintentional oversight, it is nonetheless an example of how women's names and their accomplishments are too often obliterated, even in our time.

"Yossel" Cooper's role in the eruv

It was my late father, Joseph "Yossel" Cooper who took upon himself the task of arranging the setting-up of the eruv (CJN, Jan. 11), at the instigation, I am sure, of the late Rabbi Graubart, and it was my father who arranged this with the help of the TTC and the Hydro Electric Company.

Therefore, it was he who constantly checked the condition of the eruv after the summer heat and after the winter storms, travelling by street car and on foot, in all weather conditions, making sure that the eruv was still kosher.

I remember after I first learned to drive a car in 1948, chauffeuring my father and the late Rabbi David Ochs on one of these sojourns, wherein my father was able to point out the exact location of the wires which were, as stated, from the Don to the Humber and from the lake to just north of Bloor Street.

I have been trying to obtain information regarding the "transport" of our family and the entire town in 1942. All without success.

Our shtetl was Baranow, Sandomierski, and our town was grouped with Tarnobrzeg, Mielec and others.

Herzl's radical vision changed world history

On Feb. 14, 1896, The Jewish State by Theodore Herzl first appeared in print. The CJN asked Prof. Ruth Elboim-Dror to reflect upon the importance of the anniversary.

By RACHEL ELBOIM-DROR

The 100th anniversary of the publication of Theodore Herzl's book The Jewish State provides a welcome opportunity to re-evaluate one of the most enigmatic leaders of our time and his vision of the Jewish state.

Herzl was a second generation emancipated Jew, a liberal European intellectual. He studied at the University of Vienna, the city to which his family had moved from Budapest. He received a doctorate in law, but became a writer. He wrote feuilletons and plays and worked as a reporter for an influential liberal Viennese newspaper, the Neue Freie Presse.

In 1891, Herzl was sent to Paris as a correspondent. He attended the Dreyfus trial in 1894. It is customary to attribute Herzl's change from liberal assimilationist to Jewish nationalist to the effects of the Dreyfus trial and the calls for "Death to the Jews" which echoed throughout a France caught in the throes of anti-Semitism. However, there are those who stress, instead, the painful and difficult time Herzl had as a young and enthusiastic student much taken by German nationalism who was forced to confront the realities of anti-Semitism in Vienna.

Anti-Semitism and the problem of integrating the Jews into European society and culture were basic issues that concerned Herzl from his youth on. Thus he writes in his diary: "When, really, did I first begin paying attention to the Jewish problem? ... I think it was in 1881 or 1882 ... The Jewish problem of course confronted me in every corner."

He was seeking a radical solution to the Jewish question, such as a demonstrative conversion of the Jews. He looked at the Jewish ghetto, which kept to itself, through the eyes of an assimilated Jew and accepted anti-Semitic stereotypes regarding Jewish life and the need to change it.

The idea of the establishment of a Jewish state came to Herzl as in a flash, like a sudden vision which seized him and refused to let go.

In May 1895, Herzl met Baron Maurice de Hirsch, the initiator and funder of Jewish settlement in Argentina, to try to persuade him of the need to found a Jewish state as a radical solution to the Jewish question. When he failed, Herzl went on to the Rothschild family — but here too he failed. Before visiting Hirsch, Herzl prepared a 29-page document and in preparation for his meeting with the Rothschilds he enlarged it to 65 pages, entitling it A Speech to the Rothschilds. Afterwards, he renamed it, A Speech to the Jewish People. This document served as the basis for his Der Judenstaat, The Jewish State — An attempt At a Modern Solution to the Jewish Question, which was published in February 1896.

From that time on, Herzl worked unceasingly for the realization of that idea: in August 1897 he convened, in Basel, the first Zionist Congress, founded the Zionist movement, a Zionist newspaper and bank and he met with the Turkish sultan and with many of the European heads of state to try to persuade them to have the sultan issue a charter for the Jewish settlement of Eretz Yisrael.

Herzl in 1895 — the Judenstaat period

He was the first leader who gave a clear political definition of the solution to the Jewish problem and acted to implement it. Herzl's message was phrased clearly and unequivocally: the establishment of a Jewish state. He was the first who dared to declare this openly, to speak on behalf of modern Jewish nationalism and to work to implement it.

One can define his work as politicization of the Jews, the establishment of a central political authority and its institutionalization. The lack of a united political leadership was regarded by him as the primary problem of the Jewish people and he acted with all his might to rectify it.

One can summarize Herzl's basic arguments as follows: The integration of the Jews into European society has failed despite emancipation. The blame for this failure lies on both parties. Europe cannot overcome its anti-Semitic tradition and the Jews themselves need to change and surmount their negative characteristics. This change can take place only in their own land as free people. The solution is the establishment of a Jewish state.

A Jewish state is thus an outcome of disappointment and failure. But out of this failure a new example of a modern liberal society will be born. A state that will carry a message of peace, tolerance and freedom to all of mankind, a model to be esteemed and imitated. The dreams that failed in Europe will be realized in the old-new land.

Herzl's vision is a complex mixture of reality and imagination, rationalistic approaches and wild-eyed fantasies. As he writes in the introduction to his diary: This is a majestic idea, which "confuses and intoxicates me."

His Jewish state is both a country of refuge from anti-Semitism and a model of progressive social ideas. It is based on mass immigration and develops a meritocratic elite society. It is a liberal secular state where army and religion are kept out of politics. Using the most advanced technologies it will make the desert bloom. Ignoring the realities of the Middle East, the Arab inhabitants, the conflicting ideas and ideals of religious and secular Jews, Herzl prepared a plan of action that ignited the imagination of thousands.

Herzl appeared as a meteor on the Jewish skies. His Zionist activity lasted but nine short years. He died in 1904. But during the nine years of his Zionist activity he succeeded in making a fundamental change in the Jewish world: He transformed the self-image of the diaspora Jew; he converted the bourgeois, conservative Hovevei Zion movement into a revolutionary nationalistic and modern Jewish protest movement; he insitutionalized the Zionist idea and established the foundations of the state-in-making.

The Jewish State, his utopia Altneuland, his diaries, letters, plays, articles and speeches all shed light on the complex personality of the leader of the Zionist movement — and yet he remains an enigma.

There are those who described him as a playwright of limited ability and moderate success as well as a noted journalist; a person with superficial ideas and a naive analysis of the Jewish question, who presented his ideas simply and with gall — but in a spirited manner; a man who presented himself as "the king of the Jews." There were those who regarded him as a politician, who acted as a gambler and sought to establish a Jewish state at one fell swoop; a person who lived in different cultures — the Jewish, Hungarian and German — and was alien to all of them.

Chaim Weizmann, Israel's first president, described him as one who appeared from on high. "He came from a world which was concealed to us and we bowed down before the Great Eagle who came from that world. What enchanted the Jews about Herzl was his origin in European culture. Had Herzl been a product of the cheder, the Jews would not have followed him."

A good part of Herzl's drawing power stemmed from the very fact that he was alien to the Jewish world, that he was a representative of the European cultural world upon whose doors the Jews beat but to which they were not granted full admission. The fact that Herzl had physical charm, that his bearing was aristocratic and far removed from that of the masses of Jews, enhanced his attraction.

After being disappointed by the Jewish money barons, Herzl discovered the Jewish masses and his own charismatic powers as a leader of these masses. He became aware of the nature of modern mass politics.

One may assume that Herzl's very limitations, that very superficiality and ignorance of the complexities of the cultural aspects of the Jewish question and his concentration on a single dimension, the political, were what enabled him to act efficiently and change reality. Herzl was one of the few people who in practice lived his utopia. He prepared a utopian model and lived and acted in accordance with it, as if it was about to be realized; and indeed later, after his death, he succeeded.

Herzl believed that Jewish religion would adjust to the new situation of independent political life in a Jewish state. Such changes cannot be foreseen and, therefore, there was no reason to deal with them at the formative stage, thereby possibly impairing the consensus needed to engage in immediate political action. In Herzl's priorities, what stood first and foremost was the formation of a political and organizational framework. However, this "narrow" view was not acceptable to Ahad HaAm and his colleagues, who were therefore critical of Herzl's program.

Herzl was the leader of the masses, a charismatic leader about whom legends and myths were woven already during his lifetime. The profound need to fill this role was undoubtedly deeply embedded within him and found release on those occasions when his needs and those of the masses intersected. Herzl answered the needs of the Jewish masses who sought "a new messiah." In his case, a "historic moment" and his personality coincided to bring about a shift in history.

He aroused in the Jewish masses messianic hopes. His starting point was political and rational, but he derived his emotional power and political force from irrational levels. Herzl's political Zionism, the modern secular Zionism in whose name he spoke, was nurtured by the fertile soil of thousands of years of yearning for a messianic revelation. The cries that followed Herzl, "King of the Jews" and "Messiah, son of David," found echoes in his soul, for dreams of grandeur had been one of his personal traits ever since his youth. He was able to realize both his yearning and desires and those of the Jewish masses, for redemption, for a transcendental experience.

Without doubt Herzl is one of the greatest visionary leaders history has known, one of the few whose vision — as presented in The Jewish State — changed history and became reality.

How is a Jew? The other boundary

Last column, I talked about boundaries in relation to the geographic, as well as the spiritual limits of Israel. While this is an issue with life-or-death implications for the state, there is another boundary, the one between Jew and non-Jew, that will determine how Jews will define themselves in the next century.

By Jean M. Gerber

In the national profile of Canadian Jewry and the 10 regional profiles being published using the 1991 Census data from Statistics Canada, Vancouver was distinguished by the high proportion of intermarriages in our community, compared to the two larger centres of Toronto and Montreal. I do not propose to argue, as some have, that the intermarried couples from those two centres come to live in Vancouver (although that may be true). The issue arises starkly in terms of the continuity of our community here in Canada. How do we define ourselves as Jews in an open and multi-ethnic Canada?

It is a myth that Jews have, until the advent of modernity, always married Jews, or converted out and left the community, or been victims of rapine and terror that forced them into unwelcome contact with the outside world. By embracing modernity, then, they have begun a long decline which will soon leave only a faithful remnant.

In fact, since it is obvious that there is vast heterogeneity in the physical aspect of Jews in Canada and Israel, someone has been marrying out — and in — since the time of Joseph. With or without conversion, non-Jews have attached themselves to the community for many generations.

In rabbinic times, the quasi-proselyte (assumed to be mostly men who married Jewish women but refrained from total conversion because of, shall we say, certain physical qualms) receives attention. Medieval laws against Christian contact with Jews reflect the fact that there was contact, and marriage, no doubt distressing to both sides.

Without minimizing the challenges, I want to skate out onto thin ice to offer some thoughts.

Two quick incidents illustrate what we say, and what the young hear about us. One: In a fundraiser for an Israeli project, the speaker remarks that non-Jews have no souls, and not one member of the dinner audience gets up to challenge this betrayal of Judaism's understanding of the human condition. Two: A young couple about to marry considers starting a kosher kitchen. Viewing closely the in-fighting and cut-throat (no pun intended) competition to make the pronouncement of what is kosher or treif, they walk away from the idea.

Myth number two is that if somebody really wants to convert, he or she will beat on the rabbi's study door until let in. Sorry, that study door looks permanently closed to many. Others say — well, in the aftermath of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin, what can they say? Religious Jews look like fanatics if viewed through the media. Most Jews are having trouble making sense of the present situation, let alone someone who may want to knock on that door, yet comes from a secular view of the world, a view the Jewish partner shares.

Advocates of circling the wagons picture the Jewish community as a football field, with the players on the field, the lines for in- or out-of-bounds drawn in chalk, and everybody else in the bleachers. Judaism is the field, Jews the team. You are in or out.

This is a metaphor that will not serve us well. In any case, I always find myself resisting the sports metaphor with its winners, losers and bone-crunching. Today we will not sell this metaphor to the very young people we are trying desperately to attract and hold. They live in a society many of us wanted to create, where the intrinsic worth of the individual and the strengths of other traditions are recognized by all. We cannot easily say to them now that we have lied about our commitment to a multicultural Canada. We ourselves live lives that express our assimilation into general society. Even if we speak and read Hebrew, study Talmud daily, or model behavior by keeping kashrut and Shabbat, this was often a very personal choice. And haven't we taught our children that their lives are to be shaped by the individual choices they make?

Over a year ago, Vancouver's Jewish Family Service Agency sponsored a seminar and workshops with the theme Love and Tradition. The meetings were open to all and publicity for the weekend stressed that interfaith couples and their families were the target audience. Over 300 people, most of them young couples, showed up to hear Esther Perel and others talk about interdating, intermarriage, conversion and non-conversion. Parents opened their hearts, young people asked honest and searing questions that pointed up the hurt felt when love crossed over a boundary that many did not realize even existed until they ran up against it.

There were 300 people, but few rabbis, youth workers or Hebrew school teachers.

We should be listening, because there is a lot to hear out there before any one of us can say we have an answer to the question of Jewish identity that will carry us into the next millennium.

Torah translation a stunning work

Maurice Samuel, the great essayist, novelist and Zionist activist once remarked that he always felt gratitude for the gifts of having been born into an English-speaking family and one in which Hebrew was also cherished. These happy circumstances, he said, gave him a special entry into the world of Shakespeare and the Bible.

By Arnold Ages

Samuel's thoughts on this question seem especially relevant these days as the film world honors the prose sculptured by Jane Austen for her characters in Pride and Prejudice and Sense and Sensibility.

There is another question that must be posed. Can the English language successfully convey the values, cadences and resonances of the Hebrew Bible? Purists, of course, can dismiss the question by arguing that a solid knowledge of Hebrew can do away with the need for translations in the first place. The rabbis of the Talmud were very skittish about Jews relying on any kinds of translations and they said it was a black day when the Torah was translated.

William Tyndale, the English clergyman and scholar learned the bitter truth of that rabbinic dictum when he was burned at the stake in 1536 for certain doctrinal errors which he had permitted to infiltrate his monumental translation into English of the Bible.

It has been more than 350 years since the King James version burst upon the scene but during that period it has left an indelible mark on the English language and the religious sensitivities of the English people.

It is not surprising therefore that a publishing house in South Dakota has reissued what it calls the 21st Century King James. This is not a new translation but an updating of the 1637 text in which archaisms of speech have been eliminated. Although the quaint "thee," "thy," "hath," and "cometh," have been retained for sentimental and liturgical purposes, words such as "bewray," "stablish," "dehort," "straitly" and "minish" have been replaced by betray, establish, dissuade, strictly and diminish.

Everett Fox was not after literary precision when he spent the last 27 years executing his own English version of what he calls the Five Books of Moses. This stunning translation, executed by a young American professor at Clark University in Massachusetts, is modeled on the Buber-Rosenzweig German version of the 1920s. It was featured in a recent two-page spread in Newsweek magazine.

In this ground-breaking work, Fox seeks to translate not just the meaning of the Hebrew text, but its breathless pauses, its syncopated repetitions, its poetic metre. Space limitations preclude a lengthy discussion of Fox's extraordinary talent as a translator.

In the famous first encounter of Moshe with HaShem at the burning bush, the budding leader of the Israelite nation asks: "But whom shall I say sent me?" The answer in Hebrew is Eheye asher Eheye. Fox's version is "I will be-there howsoever I will be-there" sends me. Again, in Fox's rendering of the Hebrew, Pharaoh's heart is not "hardened," as it is in most translations; here his heart is made "strong-willed."

These are only representative samples of the hundreds if not thousands of refreshingly new and original translations which Fox brings to bear. His work succeeds where most fail in demonstrating the flexibility of English in transposing the spiritual inflections of the Hebrew Bible.

I can still hear him sing

His voice is rich, pure, powerful and finely controlled. He knows how to breathe; he enunciates every word as though it were at least as important as the Bill of Rights; he avoids trickery and straining after effect and, in short, is as good a tenor as you could hope to find anywhere."

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

This was the judgement of the Pittsburg Press music critic a generation ago, after he had heard Jacob Barkin give his first recital in the city's Carnegie Hall. What impressed the writer even more was the tenor's statement (made to him in an interview), that he preferred singing in the synagogue as a cantor to being a soloist on stage in the public realm.

Elsewhere, a critic wrote that he envied Barkin's congregation for being able to hear him every week, while the concert-going public in other cities had that opportunity only once in a while.

Still, those opportunities did exist, for the cantor wrote into every contract he made, the provision that he would be allowed to take time off for a certain amount of concertizing. I know, because back in the '60s he was the chazzan at Holy Blossom Temple.

I still remember something of his out-of-town schedule during those years: Mexico City, South America and — as always — Israel. There he sang year after year in the premier festival at Caesarea. He performed at the White House in Washington a number of times, and I recall reading that Franklin D. Roosevelt was so moved by one of his renditions that he asked him to sing it again.

But despite these excursions, Barkin was most truly at home in the synagogue. Ours was but one of the several he served during his lifetime: Pittsburgh, Washington and Detroit were Conservative congregations where he served for many years. Irving Lowens, music critic of the Washington Star, called him one of the country's finest cantors.

Barkin was often compared to Richard Tucker, whom he resembled in voice and stature, but Barkin made the pulpit the centre of his life. No wonder. He imbibed the love of chazzanut from his dad, Cantor Abraham Barkin, and grew up in Toronto as a member of a highly gifted musical family. His brother Leo was a concert pianist and his sister Sara a well-known singer.

Barkin and his wife Millie (who survives him) became family friends. Toronto was home to him and he was happy to have, at last, returned here. He later confessed that his decision to make one more move was the mistake of his life. When he retired from full-time work he settled in Florida, where he died a few weeks ago.

I owe a great deal to Barkin, for he introduced me to chazzanut as it ought to be. He was knowledgeable not only in music, but in Jewish tradition in all its riches, and was self-critical enough to share with me that it was often hard to remember the chazzan's first and foremost responsibility: to sing prayerfully, so that the congregation would be led not so much to admire the voice issuing from the pulpit, but to pray with devotion. That recognition was part of his great impact. I can still hear him singing.

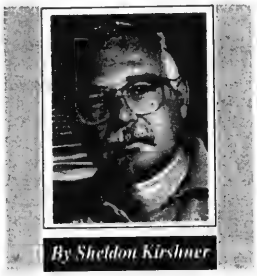
Nazis expropriated Luther's anti-Semitic rantings

Protestants in Germany will mark the 450th anniversary of the death of Martin Luther — the father of the Reformation — later this week at solemn ceremonies.



By Sheldon Kirshner

The special events — church services, exhibitions and tours — will take place in several locales: Eisleben, where he was born (Nov. 10, 1483) and died (Feb. 18, 1546); Erfurt and Wittenberg, where he completed part of his studies; Wartburg, where he found safety from prosecution by the pope; and Augsburg, Nuremberg and Worms, where his rebellious ideas initially took root.

In paying homage to the man and his doctrine, Lutheran leaders should also reflect on Luther's darker side, his crazed anti-Semitic dimension, which surfaced when he was middle aged.

To their credit, thoughtful Lutherans have already begun to come to grips with this embarrassing legacy, which was exploited to the hilt by the Nazis. Last summer, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada denounced Luther's "anti-Judaic diatribes" at its biennial national conference in Winnipeg. Prior to that, Lutheran churches in the United States and elsewhere had issued similar declarations.

As a glance at his career indicates, Luther's open hostility to Jews was formed by his conviction that they had utterly rejected his well-meaning theological message.

Before he was infected by the bacillus of anti-Semitism, Luther was something of a defender of Jews, condemning their persecution and recommending greater tolerance of them.

In a pamphlet entitled That Christ Was Born a Jew, Luther expressed understanding that Jews had rebuffed the conversionary overtures of the Roman Catholic church, which he considered spiritually lax and corrupt.

"For they have dealt with the Jews as if they were dogs and not human beings," he wrote indignantly. "They have done nothing for them but curse them and seize their wealth. Whenever they converted them, they did not teach them either Christian law or life but only subjected them to papistry and monkery."

In an aside, he added: "I hope that, if the Jews are treated friendly and are instructed kindly enough through the Bible, many of them will become real Christians and come back to the ancestral faith of the prophets and patriarchs ..."

Luther's show of friendship for Jews was not motivated by any respect for Judaism, but by "a thirst to redeem them by destroying Judaism," British/Israeli scholar Paul Lawrence Rose has written in Revolutionary Anti-Semitism in Germany.

Once it was apparent to Luther that the children of Israel were resistant to the call of Christianity, he performed a volte-face, turning his wrath on Jews.

In the first glimmerings of his growing antipathy, Luther upbraided Jews for their misguided interpretation of Scripture. Later, Luther's condemnation of usury took on an anti-Jewish cast, while his mean-spirited characterization of Jews as "stiff-necked, iron-hearted and stubborn as the devil" drove him further into fanaticism.

In 1543, Luther's animus probably reached its apotheosis in a vituperative pamphlet, Concerning the Jews and Their Lies, in which he urged the authorities to act against Jews with the utmost severity.

"What then shall we Christians do with this damned, rejected race of Jews? Since they live among us and we know about their lying and blasphemy and cursing, we cannot tolerate them ..."

"First, their synagogues or churches (sic) should be set on fire, and whatever does not burn up should be covered or spread over with dirt so that no one may ever be able to see a cinder or stone of it.

"Secondly, their homes should likewise be broken down and destroyed.

"Thirdly, they should be deprived of their prayer books and Talmuds in which such idolatry, lies, cursing and blasphemy are taught.

"Fourthly, their rabbis must be forbidden under the threat of death to teach anymore ...

"Fifthly, passports and travelling privileges should be absolutely forbidden to Jews.

"Sixthly, they ought to be stopped from usury. All their cash and valuables of silver and gold ought to be taken from them and put aside for safekeeping.

"Seventhly, let the young Jews and Jewesses be given the flail, the ax, the hoe, the spade, the distaff and spindle, and let them earn their bread by the sweat of their noses ..."

Luther's admonitions, a grand elaboration of traditional anti-Semitic themes, were gleefully expropriated by the Third Reich and carried out to the letter during Kristallnacht in November 1938. Adolf Hitler, of course, considered Luther a great German, and the Nazi party institutionalized his anti-Jewish ravings.

Fusing the anti-Semitic elements of Luther's dogma with the rabid German nationalism espoused by Hitler, the Nazis created the ultimate nightmarish vision of a chauvinistic society run amok.

Never-ending flow

They keep on coming, in a never-ending flow. Capsule reviews of books of Jewish interest:

The early modern period was a crucial one in Jewish history. In The Jews of Christian Europe 1400-1700 (Routledge, Chapman & Hall, $45.50), John Edwards provides a magisterial analysis of Christian-Jewish relations against the backdrop of the Spanish Inquisition, the Renaissance, the Reformation and the Counter-Reformation.

A companion volume, Tradition and Crisis: Jewish Society At The End Of The Middle Ages (Random House, $22.50), is an erudite study on the movement of European Jewry toward modernity. The author, Jacob Katz, teaches at the Hebrew University.

A third volume, Englishmen And Jews: Social Relations And Political Culture 1840-1914 (Yale University Press, $45 US), should be read in conjunction with the above two. David Feldman's study is sweeping in scope.

Journey To Oblivion (University of Toronto Press, $35) is the story of two closely-related languages — Yiddish and German — in Eastern Europe before World War II. Through the medium of literature, Peter Stenberg describes their respective path and fate.

The manner in which writers like Chaucer, Shakespeare, Dickens and a host of other novelists depicted Jews is the subject of Jewish Presences In English Literature (McGill-Queens, $34.95), edited by Derek Cohen and Deborah Heller.

The paperback edition of Esther Delisle's ground-breaking work, The Traitor And The Jew (Robert Davies Publishing, $14.99), is now available. Her analysis of French Canadian nationalism and anti-Semitism during the 1930s is most instructive.

The Stigma Of Names: Anti-Semitism In German Daily Life 1812-1923 (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $69) by Dietz Bering deftly explores the curious relationship between Jewish surnames and Judeophobia.

Starstruck by horoscopes

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN-AYON

An early morning thud signals the daily paper's delivery. Admittedly, its front pages are not necessarily the focus of everyone's attention. For some it is the sports, for others it is the mysterious fluctuations of yesterday's investments.

For others it goes like this: "A delightful romance will lead to a new job." "You are not as vulnerable as you think." "Touchy relatives need to talk." I am referring, of course, to the horoscope, something to which some people subscribe and live accordingly, as others might choose their wardrobe after reading the day's forecast.

How Jewish, if Jewish at all, is this belief in the power of the stars over our lives? Wednesday, Feb. 21, is the new month of Adar, Rosh Chodesh. Upon closer examination of a good Jewish calendar, one will see two little fish — the zodiac sign for Pisces!

This month is somewhat of a favored one, indeed a lucky month. "With the onset of Adar, one rejoices," is a traditional phrase.

Fish are a symbol of fertility. When Jacob blessed his children, he told them: "Multiply like fish, across the land."

The very name Pisces is plural, the only one of the 12 signs with this distinction. Fish exist in water, a natural, life-sustaining element, representative of both bounty and purity.

Classical literature contains many references to astrology and numerous customs are based on it. We routinely wish someone mazal tov — which translates as a good luck or good fortune. There exists a definite place for this belief, certainly not the popular journalistic astrology, but an authentic astrology, the belief that just as the sun's position over earth affects climate, so too do the constellations' configurations influence events.

Belief in stars is not really in them, but in the powers invested in them by G-d, the creator. This power is the natural order of the world. Just as summer follows spring, fall is always first, then winter. Nothing can change the course of seasons.

So too is the reality of the zodiac. Having said that, I must continue by explaining that there is a possible and even greater force in action than that of the stars. A person has the ability to relate directly to G-d and to shape one's existence with that G-d by virtue of one's actions.

The vacuum created by an absence of faith or a lifestyle devoid of spirituality sets one's life course on default, to be directed solely by these heavenly bodies. An individual can instead bypass the natural order and have one's day governed not by astrology but by meritocracy.

Ethiopians' treatment a disgrace

By ESTHER HERTZOG
Special to The CJN

The Ethiopian immigrants came to Israel all wrapped up in a package deal.

Guest Voices

The rabbinate agreed to their coming in exchange for the letting of a drop of blood from the sexual organ of each adult male (a confirmation of their Jewishness, which incidentally has still not been fully recognized) and with the proviso that their children would attend religious schools. The Ethiopians agreed.

Most of them underwent the bloodletting ritual, a physically, spiritually and collectively humiliating business, and their children go to state religious schools. They were told it was for their own good, and they believed it.

They were all placed in absorption centres and the children were put into absorption classes. They were told it was for the sake of their advancement and their integration, and they really wanted to believe it.

All of them were given blood tests and it was explained to anyone who enquired that "they" had many contagious diseases. They were given preventive pills en masse, which caused horrendous stomachaches. These they suffered stoically - or threw away the pills secretly - and didn't understand why Israelis were being warned not to come near them for six months.

Their rabbis were dispatched like a pack of fools to a course at the "real" rabbinate given by Israeli rabbis and the children were sent away to religious boarding schools. They were told that this would make them equal in the eyes of "kosher" Israeli Jews and that their children would have an equal opportunity to go on to higher education.

And if their kesim hadn't been barred from the rabbinate and if most of their children hadn't failed their bagrut, they might almost have believed it.

And then they were all branded with the mark of AIDS and it was even explained to them that it had nothing to do with racism.

And then, like Ahad Ha'am's Jews faced with blood-libel, they couldn't believe any longer. This latest blood-libel was the straw that broke the camel's back.

Had there been some differentiation made, for example, between Ethiopians who came here in the '80s and those who came in the '90s; or between the young generation (which tends to have an active sex life) and older people (who are generally less sexually active) the immigrants might have played along. They might have kept quiet had they been told openly that they couldn't donate their blood and been given a reason, valid or not. That they might well have accepted.

But they found themselves treated like some blighted, primitive group, like a bunch of lepers, and that the Ethiopians couldn't take.

What the authorities are now saying is that they were only trying to preserve the Ethiopian immigrants' sense of honor - but the immigrants have stopped believing either the facts as presented or in the authorities'good intentions. So have I.

"There's an optical illusion here about the proportion of HIV carriers among Ethiopian immigrants," said Dr. Ronny Shtarkshall, of the Hebrew University-Hadassah School of Public Health and Community Medicine in a Ma'ariv interview two years ago, during the previous wave of rumors.

"There has been no general check for HIV carriers among the Israeli population. The estimate is 3,000, but the real figure cannot be known.

"And in any case," the doctor said, "the incidence of AIDS among Ethiopian Jews is far lower than in Western countries like the United States, Switzerland and France. This is chiefly because sexual promiscuity and homosexuality, the most frequent causes of HIV transmission, simply don't exist."

Is there or isn't there a huge risk, above the average, of AIDS in the Ethiopian community here?

I have a theory: There are various interested parties here, and all of them want to preserve the Ethiopians as a mass to be manipulated and concentrated in absorption centres (which need a reason to go on receiving funds for existing) and dominated.

Once it has been "established" that the Ethiopians as a community pose an AIDS danger, they can be smeared with mud, tricked, their children isolated and their blood tossed into the garbage bucket.

For long years to come, the Ethiopians will go on filling a mystical, much-needed role for researchers, absorption organizations and the media.

Finding just what you need

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Compare that to a library, where each and every book is catalogued, ordered and shelved in its proper spot.

What a relief!

The Internet is both of those places.

The problem is pinpointing the information you are looking for and skipping the junk. Unfortunately, there is no central "Table of Contents for the Internet." But that doesn't mean information has to be difficult to find or the experience overwhelming.

Today we'll look at two easy ways to hunt for Jewish information.

Some industrious people have scoured the Internet for "sites" or "pages" on Jewish and Israeli themes. They've taken what they've found and created their own centralized pages with links to dozens or even hundreds of other Jewish sites. These pages are like airline hubs that do nothing but connect to other places.

One of those people is Andrew Tannenbaum of Brookline, Mass. His Judaism and Jewish Resources [http://shamash.nysernet.org/trb/judaism.html] is clearly a labor of love of with a special focus on the State of Israel, archeology, Jewish singles and much more.

Another is Matthew Album. His A-Z of Jewish and Israel Related Resources [http://www.ort.org/anjy/a-z] is updated several times a week and is growing at an incredible rate.

But for sheer size and scope, pay a visit to Steve Ruttenberg's Ultimate Jewish/Israel Link Launcher. [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/launcher.html]. As of Jan. 1, it had over 2,200 links!

You will find overlap between the lists, but you are also bound to find some gems on one list that don't appear on another.

If you still haven't found what you're looking for, you can use a program which will search through millions of pages of text for the word or words you are looking for.

One of the most popular search programs (or "engines" as they are known) is called Open Text. Type [http://www.opentext.com/omw/f-omw.html], fill in the blanks, press the search "button" and your results will appear almost instantly.

Yahoo is another great site. You can look for any topic by typing [http://www.yahoo.com]. However, if you'd like to jump right to the list of Jewish topics, type [http://www.yahoo.com/Society_and_Culture/Religion/Judaism/]. The Israeli topics can be found at [http://www.yahoo.com/text/Regional/Countries/Israel].

There are many more search programs out there. Over 30 others have been conveniently gathered together at the All-in-One Search Page. [http://www.albany.net/allinone/all1www.html#WWW].

And if you still haven't found what you are looking for, you need help.

In a future column, we'll look at how you can ask for that help, send mail and meet other people through the Jewish Highway's news groups and electronic mailing lists.

A word of caution. Much has been written about objectionable material that can be found on the Internet. It is there if you know where to look.

The same tools that can be used to find information about the Holocaust can also lead you to information produced by deniers of the Holocaust. It's just a click away. If you are concerned about being offended, watch where you click.

If you are concerned about the sites your children may visit, explain to them what is out there and establish ground rules about their use of the Internet.

The Internet can be scary, intimidating or just a colossal waste of time. It can also a marvelous tool to learn about our people and the world.

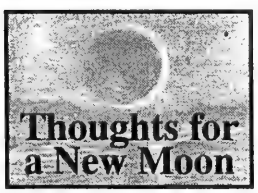
Purim: a story of exile



By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

Purim approaches and our thoughts turn once again to the story of the Jews in Persia. The Book of Esther opens with a statement of location: "from Hodu to Cush, over 127 provinces." The first verse makes it clear that this is a story defined by its location — it is a story of exile. The Jewish people find themselves threatened with annihilation because they are branded as "different."

Esther, a young Jewish woman, is forced into the midst of the problem. As the story progresses, she alone must have Haman's edict against the Jews rescinded. Esther's life can be seen as the embodiment of the entire Jewish people.

Esther attempts to live a quiet life; yet she becomes involved through no choice of her own. The king is searching for a bride and demands that all the maidens compete. Esther is brought to him and ultimately chosen as queen. As she takes up her life in the palace, she again prefers to remain silent, to live complacently.

She is forced to become active, however, when Mordecai insists that she approach the king. Esther depicts the typical existence of the Jewish people in exile. Some Jews believe, as Esther did, that they can live a quiet existence and remain uninvolved with the world around them. Others fool themselves into believing that they are unaffected by the attitude of society toward their people — Esther likewise fooled herself.

When it becomes clear that she must get involved, Esther executes a brilliant strategy. If Haman's edict is rescinded, she is attacking only the symptom and not the cause. She must succeed in bringing down Haman himself. Esther understands that the king takes nothing so seriously as his manhood. This man easily killed his first queen for disobeying his summons. Esther executes a plan wherein the king views Haman as threatening his manhood and consequently orders Haman's death.

Esther accomplishes this by inviting the king along with Haman to her private parties. The king begins to wonder why Haman is continuously invited. Later, when Haman falls on the queen's "bed" to beg for mercy, the king immediately assumes he is making advances toward her and orders that Haman be hanged.

Esther thoroughly understands the world in which she finds herself and manages to mould the circumstances. Unfortunately, there are Jews who sit in exile and assume the world around them is a Jewish world — it is not. Jewish values are not the norm in the world at large.

When the community is faced with a problem, it is important to understand the avenues that are open to pursuit. The reality of exile is that we must function in two worlds at all times. Esther has a Jewish name (Hadas) and a Persian name — so do we. She understood that one cannot live passively in exile. Queen Esther is not only a role model, she is also a depiction of the Jewish psyche as it functions and grows in exile.

Are alimony agreements becoming meaningless?

As discussed in the Feb. 1 issue, a recent minority decision by Madame Justice l"Heureux-Dubé that "final" alimony agreements could be challenged on the basis of "fairness" (whatever that means) has created a state of legal limbo wherein the Court could now arguably ignore the agreement and make an Order for alimony that it thinks is "fair", given the circumstances of the case.

Madame Justice L'Heureux-Dubé does give some vague comfort to lawyers who draft these agreements if they incorporate words that reflect the economic basis for the agreement on spousal support: "The weight to be given to agreements will depend first, on the extent to which the agreement reflects the principles and objectives stated in section 17 of the Divorce Act, 1985, and, second, on the scope and nature of the change which has occurred, taking into account all the circumstances of the parties. The more the agreement or support order takes the overarching principle of the Act into account in promoting an equitable distribution of the economic consequences of the marriage and its breakdown, the more likely it will be to influence the outcome of a variation application. In drafting future agreements, counsel would be well advised to articulate the bases on which both spousal and child support covenants have been negotiated .... it would clearly be useful for the parties to mention the various factors and objectives they took into account in their agreement to share the economic consequences of the marriage and its breakdown."

With the greatest respect to what her Lordship is trying to achieve, this new approach to separation agreements and marriage contracts creates tremendous uncertainty. No lawyer can now assure a payer spouse that the agreement finally binds the other spouse. In her minority decision, Madame Justice l"Heureux-Dubé is now insisting that such agreements recite a detailed explanation as to why the parties feel that the support provisions are fair in writing, and in the agreement itself. If some prospective Court doesn't feel that the explanation takes into account all the future needs or means of either spouse, then in her view it can ignore the agreement, despite any wording that suggests that the agreement is final and cannot be overturned.

Greater Toronto Area

Author urges women to challenge the status quo

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The footnotes alone take up 75 pages of Aviva Cantor's most recent book, Jewish Women/Jewish Men: The Legacy of Patriarchy in Jewish Life.

That the New York author has a passion for detail is obvious. Her meaty tome, released last year, reflects her vast knowledge of Jewish issues and the movement she remembers from the days it was known as Women's Liberation.

The "recognition that Jewish life is and always has been a patriarchy, a society dominated by men," serves as the prism through which the book examines a long list of issues. Anti-Semitism, assimilation, Zionism, Jewish family life, community leadership, even weight and thinness are all examined under Cantor's distinctive microscope.

An interviewer, about to meet her for the first time, might be forgiven for expecting to find a "farbrente feminist," to borrow one of Cantor's own expressions.

But the label is too one-dimensional to paint an accurate picture. "I consider myself a realist," Cantor said in an interview on the eve of Jewish Women's Voices, the January feminist conference at which she was an invited speaker.

The 55-year-old grey-haired woman sitting at her Toronto host's kitchen table didn't look particularly farbrente. Dressed casually and unpretentiously, with knitted slippers on her feet and a panda bear sweatshirt pulled over her clothes, Cantor had set water to boil for tea and lifted a cat off the table before pulling up her chair.

She said that she herself calls an Orthodox organization to have prayers said at the Kotel when someone is sick, although she knows she may be dealing with "the same guys who threw chairs at women who wanted to pray with a Torah at the Wall. My God!" she exclaimed at the thought.

In the early days of the feminist movement, Cantor, who studied journalism at Columbia University, was criticized by her peers for taking a job at the "mainstream" Hadassah magazine.

Around the same time, she experienced a different kind of conflict at home, trying to divide household chores in an exact 50-50 split with husband Murray Zuckoff before they reached a workable compromise.

Aviva Cantor

Her career has included stints at the Jewish Telegraphic Agency and the New York bureau of the London Jewish Chronicle, although she is better known as a co-founder of Lilith, the glossy Jewish feminist quarterly magazine which she edited for 11 years, and as the author of The Egalitarian Hagada.

The latter book was written for everyone "from the little kids spilling the wine to the great-grandparents."

Cantor believes "it's not totally consonant with the spirit of Pesach to have separate seders for anybody." She has participated in a feminist seder only once.

Although she has spent most of her adult life as a secular Zionist, Cantor attended an Orthodox day school as a youngster and went through a phase of being observant as a teenager.

A history major before she studied journalism, Cantor is practically on a first-name basis with ancient rabbis. "There was a wonderful rabbi in the Middle Ages, Rabbi Perez of Corbeil, who tried to have a takana (amendment to Jewish law) regarding battered wives. I found him very human," she said.

"I think the traditional rabbis, the great ones, would have found solutions to some of the questions we raise today."

Cantor urges women to be "militant" in challenging the status quo. A Jewish feminist organization is desperately needed, she said.

She often finds her own answers in the process of writing.

Her new book is the result of six years of intensive work, incorporating material she'd gathered in the form of newspaper clippings and her own reportage (including original notes) on feminist events and issues dating back to 1963.

Unexpectedly, Cantor, who had felt comfortable expressing her Judaism in a secular way, became increasingly convinced about "the centrality of Halachah" as she worked on the book.

Writing about connectedness with the past, Cantor was moved to start lighting Shabbat candles again, although she had yet to reach any conclusion about Halachah.

"After that I started putting a tablecloth on the table. I decided to cook something special. One thing led to another."

About four or five years into the book, Cantor stopped working and shopping on Shabbat. At the suggestion of an Orthodox friend, she began using paper clips on Shabbat to mark newspaper items she wanted to keep, giving new meaning to the term "clipping," she laughed.

On a broader scale, Cantor finds her personal changes "problematic. On the one hand, I believe in pluralism. People need to find their own way, but I do believe in Halachah. The problem is [that] Halachah hasn't evolved for a long time, and it needs to."

Group helps promote dialogue between Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As if it wasn't hard enough to combat negative stereotypes of Orthodox Jews, the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin has made the task doubly difficult.

Yet Yavneh Olami, a Jerusalem-based organization that supports observant students, is attempting to do just that — bridge the gap between Orthodox and secular Jews by promoting dialogue between them, said the organization's executive-director, Maury Kelman.

During a recent visit to Toronto, Kelman said Meretz city councillor Anat Hoffman was invited to address a recent memorial service in Jerusalem for Rabin sponsored by Yavneh Olami and "she had a hard time geting over blaming us [Orthodox Jews] even though we're trying to create dialogue."

Several of Yavneh Olami's programs have been geared to fostering better relations, either directly through programs like the Rabin memorial or indirectly by moulding observant young people into "ambassadors for Judaism," Kelman said.

But the organization's prime mission is to support observant university-aged students in Israel and the Diaspora through a variety of programs and initiatives, Kelman said.

It has also begun to sponsor programs in the Toronto area, and recently hosted a Shabbaton for 55 young adults at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue.

In addition to sponsoring cultural programs, Yavneh Olami hopes to attract young people by creating a non-threatening atmosphere in which their concerns over everyday issues are addressed, he said.

Many observant young people grow up in a "cocooned" lifestyle and on entering university for the first time are confronted with new issues and new views on everything from sexual ethics to criticism of the Bible's divine origins, he said.

Many are unprepared to respond to these views, not having encountered them before, said Kelman, 30, who is an ordained rabbi.

Yavneh Olami brings these young people together in study groups and social situations and discusses with them the Jewish perspective on current issues. Among the issues tackled at Israeli meetings are the Jewish view of Western morality, ethical issues like cheating and Judaism's views on the environment.

People must realize that Orthodox youth are watching Seinfeld and Friends and are interested in many of the same issues as their non-observant contemporaries, said Kelman, an alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools.

Not only does Yavneh Olami strengthen their Judaism, it also encourages them to be open and friendly to those who hold different views, to serve as "ambassadors for Judaism" by presenting a positive image of Orthodox Jews.

Established in 1984 in Jerusalem by, among others, former MK Yossi Shapiro and Avraham Duvdevani, who headed the leadership training division of the Jewish Agency, Yavneh Olami lay dormant until revived by Kelman in late 1994.

The organization now attracts hundreds of observant Jews under 30 — mostly anglophone olim — to numerous activities that include a weekly beit midrash (lessons on scripture), social events, prayer services and even bone marrow drives.

So far in Canada, it's spreading by word of mouth and several young Canadians have enrolled in its summer job internship programs in Israel. Yavneh Olami is currently looking for counsellors to work at Israeli summer day camps in community centres, Kelman said. It is also sponsoring a Jerusalem 3000 seminar from June 16 to 23, with classes on historical and modern Jerusalem and on Jerusalem through the arts.

It differs from existing student organizations by spanning various campuses and being aimed at observant students, he added.

Put More Money In Your Pocket.

One of the few remaining ways Canadians can reduce the income tax they pay is by making contributions to an RSP. However, few of us have the cash required to make our maximum contribution.

By borrowing your maximum contribution, you can lower the amount of tax you pay now, and actually keep more of your hard earned money. Consider the following example.

John, age 30, has a maximum RSP contribution limit of $8,100. So far, he's only been able to save $2,100. Let's consider the benefits of John borrowing the additional $6,000 he needs to reach his limit.

Scenario #1

John decides not to borrow, leaving his total 1995 RSP contribution amount at $2,100. Assuming his combined federal and provincial tax rate is about 42%, his tax savings would be $882 (42% x $2,100). If his $2,100 RSP investment earns 10% per year over 25 years, it will grow to $23,000.

Scenario #2

John borrows the additional $6,000 to reach his goal of making his maximum contribution of $8,100. At his combined tax rate of 42%, his tax savings will be $3,402. If he receives this as a tax refund, he can reduce his loan immediately to $2,598.

$6,000	original amount borrowed
$3,402	less his tax refund amount applied to the loan
$2,598	new loan balance

John has also made a big difference in the value of his savings for his retirement years. By borrowing the $6,000 required to make his maximum contribution, John's $8,100 contribution, earning 10%, will have grown to $88,000 at age 55. That's $65,000 more than if he only contributed $2,100! That's the power of borrowing your maximum contribution.

We'll prepare an RSP loan for you in twenty minutes. Visit your local branch for more details.

Pedestal designed for memorial candles

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Six outstretched hands, each forefinger pointing upward at the Hebrew word zachor (remember), form part of a recent ly unveiled sandstone pedestal designed for Holocaust memorial candles.

The group started distributing the candles about a decade ago for Beth Tzedec members to light in their homes on Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Memorial Day).

The idea spread, and this year approximately 200,000 candles will be distributed through Conservative synagogue men's clubs across North America, said Jules Surdin, Men's Club special projects chair, who conceived of the candle program "so that children now and future generations will ask, 'Why?' "

After Singer came up with the idea of creating a pedestal for the candles, a committee from Beth Tzedec proposed a design contest for ceramicists affiliated with the Koffler Gallery. The artists, however, declined to participate, insisting that Reches — the Koffler's artist in residence — was the one who should execute the design.

A Polish-born Holocaust survivor who worked as a cake decorator before taking up sculpting in his retirement years, Reches is now in his 80s. Many of his sculptures depict scenes of the Holocaust and of pre-Holocaust shtetls.

The pedestal symbolizes the six million Jews killed in the Holocaust reaching up through barbed wire.

Through Beth Tzedec's sisterhood gift shop, the pedestal is being made available to sisterhood gift shops in Conservative synagogues across North America, at a suggested price of $18.

Kids, adults paint unique gift for Jerusalem

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 100 children and adults gathered recently in the Artists' Lounge of the CBC Building to paint a mural which will be a gift to the city of Jerusalem in celebration of its 3,000 anniversary.

Sponsored by the New Leadership Group (NLG) of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, the mosaic, created with some 200 hand-painted wooden tiles, is part of its Paint for Peace project.

Under the direction of artist Ian Leventhal, the mural is a tribute to the universal character of the city. The tiles were painted in Leventhal's characteristic whimsical style and depict Jerusalem's various Jewish, Christian and Muslim archeological and historical sites.

"It's not often that we get to celebrate a birthday of 3,000 years," says Leventhal.

Connie Putterman, co-chair of the NLG with Glenn Gold, told The CJN that the Paint for Peace project is a gift from the Toronto NLG to the Nurit Street Elementary School in Kiryat Menachem in Jerusalem, "as a gift of peace and hope and a symbol of our connection to them. We are hopeful that our contribution will provide an esthetic addition to the school."

The idea for the mural, says Gold, came from a brainstorming session with Leventhal who is an active member of the NLG. "The idea was to do a hands-on event and aim it as a fun day for parents and kids — and it was."

Putterman said the Paint for Peace day was also a kick-off for a NLG fundraising event. The completed mural will be on display at the CBC Building on May 11, where it will form a backdrop for an evening soiree of interactive Middle Eastern cooking and belly dancing sponsored by the NLG in celebration of Jerusalem 3000.

The mural will later be taken to Jerusalem, where members of the NLG and the Toronto board of the Jerusalem Foundation will participate in an international conference of Jerusalem Foundation members celebrating Jerusalem 3000.

The NLG recently raised $30,000 to build a children's park in Kiryat Menachem in Jerusalem.

"Our projects primarily are aimed to support underprivileged children," says Putterman. "This coming year, our goal is to fund a children's music room in a school in the same neighborhood."

NLG members are 25 to 45 years old and Gold says new members are welcome (416-413-0100). "We have a passion for Jerusalem and we like to do something about it," he says. "Along with raising money, the NLG members participate in cultural events and leadership development activities, and we like to have fun."

The Jerusalem Foundation is a charitable trust founded by former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek in 1966 for the purpose of improving the quality of life in the city.

TORONTO — When Sudha Ghelani began working at Associated Hebrew Schools in 1978, she knew little about Judaism.

Now, not only is she well-versed, she is amazed at how much her religion, Jainism, has in common with Judaism.

"We are vegetarian; so there is the aspect of dietary restrictions. We have a fast day which we spend praying for forgiveness and we also have Diwali, a celebration of lights. At one Chanukah celebration I showed [everyone in the school] how we light our lamps and they have been using the same method for their menorah.

"Another thing we have in common is that we get married under a wedding canopy and the bride and groom walk around each other seven times. Our calendar is a lunar calendar as well, so we have 13 months every three years. To top it off, I was pleased to discover that I could buy kosher cheese because it contains no [animal] rennet. All these similarities contributed to an immediate bond that is still strong today."

Sudha Ghelani

Ghelani, who arrived in Canada from Bombay, India, in 1971, said she worked at a variety of accounting jobs before she was hired as senior bookkeeper at Associated.

"I felt like I had arrived home. The staff was wonderful, the people I dealt with were friendly — everyone here was like family to me. In Toronto, my only family is my husband, daughter and son, so being so close to the people with whom I work fills in a gap."

Now manager of accounts, Ghelani is responsible for such tasks as managing the school payroll, budget and accounting.

"Anything financial is referred directly to me. I am the first person places such as Revenue Canada, Workers Compensation or the Jewish Board of Education contact. As the largest Hebrew Day School in Toronto, we have about 300 teachers, as well as supply teachers; so each year I prepare about 500 T4 slips. It is my responsibility to ensure that everything runs smoothly."

She concedes that as a working mother, she is constantly trying to balance work and home life. "I discovered quickly, however, that the people at Associated are totally responsive to my needs. If I needed a day off to stay with a sick child they always understood. I could always be honest.

"In turn, they know they can count on me. For me, the interests of the school come first and I want it to be among the top Jewish organizations. I'm always trying to do things as effectively as possible and always trying to save them money. We really have a give-and-take relationship and it makes everyone feel good. We all know that if we respect someone, they, in turn, will respect us."

"Those who are lucky in life are those who leave something behind. You were such a man, my friend."

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF CANADA

Announcing the establishment of the

Yitzhak Rabin Forest

in the Jerusalem Corridor

The Jewish National Fund has traditionally dedicated a park or forest in memory of former Prime Ministers of Israel. The area of the Jerusalem Corridor is closely associated with Yitzhak Rabin. During Israel's War of Independence, he commanded a brave Palmach Brigade in that area and always felt a close attachment.

Therefore, the Jewish National Fund will replant, rename and rededicate the Jerusalem Corridor area as the Yitzhak Rabin Forest in memory and in honour of Israel's slain Prime Minister.

Some dream about changing the world. Yitzhak Rabin tried to turn dreams into reality — to end decades of blood and tears. You now have the opportunity to honour the memory and the vision of Yitzhak Rabin by participating in the development of the Yitzhak Rabin Forest.

Chinese group helps CJC fight human rights case

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Chinese Benevolent Association (CBA) has contributed $2,000 to the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P) legal defence trust fund to help Congress fight a human rights case against controversial columnist Doug Collins and the newspapaer he writes for, the North Shore News.

The specific column CJC-P is objecting to is one published March 10, 1994, headed Hollywood Propaganda, which deals with the movie Schindler's List.

CJC-P filed the complaint last year with the B.C. Human Rights Council and is waiting for a decision regarding a hearing by a Human Rights tribunal. The complaint was filed under a section of B.C. Human Rights Act Bill 33, which is designed to discourage publication of hatred and contempt material against a person or group of persons.

"Since Bill 33 was passed in 1993 as legislation to combat the proliferation of discriminatory publications in B.C., its effectiveness as an instrument of protection for identifiable groups has never been put to a test," Yee said. "This test case will have profound implications for all cultural and religious minorities who seek to be free from vilification and hatred."

Congress was represented at the dinner by Dr. Michael Elterman, regional chair; national executive chair Renee Switzer Bellas; honorary legal counsel Herb Silber; and CJC-P executive director, Erwin Nest. Neil Steinman, chair of the Congress legal advisory committee, discussed various aspects of the complaint.

Raise funds

CJC-P has been conducting a campaign among Jewish lawyers in the area to raise the funds to retain specialized legal counsel to fight the case.

Other racial and religious groups represented at the dinner that pledged financial support included the Canadian Pakistani Congress, Canadian Arab Federation, Congress of Black Women, Council of the Muslim Community in Canada, Khadsa Divan Society, National Association of Canadians of Origin in India, Filipino Canadian Congress, United Chinese Enrichment Services Society, Immigrant Service Society, Vancouver Multicultural Society, Pacific Interfaith Citizenship Association of B.C., Anglican Church of Canada — diocese of New Westminster, Roman Catholic Archdiocese, Unitarian Church, United Church of Canada — B.C. Conference.

Aziz Khaki, president of the Committee for Racial Justice, which sponsored the dinner, said, "We have joined hands with one of our member organizations which has initiated an action, the outcome of which is important for all of us.

Mount Royal Liberals give support to Finestone

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Lawyer Eric Maldoff denied that he has been asked by the federal Liberal party to run as a candidate in Mount Royal or any other riding, now or in the next election.

"The only place I hear this is in the press ... It seems to be generated by the media," he told The CJN. "I have not been asked to run ... I'm flattered that the media think I have. I find it all quite amusing."

Mount Royal Liberal Association president Sidney Margles also sought to put to rest rumors that Sheila Finestone, 69, is being urged to give up her seat and allow Maldoff to join the cabinet as the Chretien government prepares for this crucial phase of the national unity debate.

"Mrs. Finestone has no intention of giving up her seat at this time," Margles said. "In fact, she has not ruled out seeking re-election."

The riding association board "wholeheartedly endorsed" Finestone's continuing as MP after she lost her position as secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women last month. "The board meets again in March and I don't expect that position to change," Margles stated.

He said there is some ill-feeling within the association and among constituents that anglophone Quebecers have received a "raw deal" by losing their only cabinet minister.

Finestone lost her portfolio to make way for a young francophone Quebecer, Outremont backbencher Martin Cauchon, who is now secretary of state for Quebec regional development.

"There's been an outpouring of support for [Finestone] since she was eliminated from the cabinet" from constituents, Margles said. "It's been a spontaneous response."

Margles acknowledged that Maldoff is among numerous names circulating as possible contenders for one of the surest Liberal seats in the country in the next general election, which could be another two years away.

Among the names is Margles' himself. "I never rule anything out. Two years is a long time."

Maldoff, who practises with the firm Martineau Walker, also works as an adviser to Prime Minister Jean Chretien. Currently, he is negotiating on behalf of the government certain native land claims.

Founding president of the anglophone rights group, Alliance Quebec, Maldoff, now in his early 40s, has held a number of respected community positions, including president of the Montreal Children's Hospital, and is a frequent television political commentator.

Margles is virtually sure that the next Liberal candidate in Mount Royal will be anglophone and/or ethnic. "The reality in Quebec over the past 40 or 50 years is that religion, ethnicity or language have been factors in representation."

One veteran riding association insider, who asked not to be named, said it was unlikely the Chretien government would ease out another Quebec Jewish MP. St. Henri-Westmount David Berger was persuaded to give up his seat to Lucienne Robillard just over a year ago and he was rewarded by being named ambassador to Israel.

"The Liberal Party has many friends in the Jewish community and a lot of funds are raised in the community, so it's not likely it would break with the tradition of having at least one Jewish representative from Quebec," the insider said.

MONTREAL — The Canadian Committee for Jerusalem 3000 is organizing a tour of Israel May 29 to June 10, with Neri Bloomfield, the committee's national chair. The trip will coincide with Canada Week June 2 to 9, part of the official Jerusalem 3000 calendar, as well as other cultural events.

The intinerary includes three nights in Tiberias at the Moriah Plaza, five nights in Jerusalem's Sheraton Plaza and three nights in the Nirvana at the Dead Sea.

Neri Bloomfield

A highlight of Canada Week is a performance of the Gala des Etoiles, an annual showcase of leading Canadian and international ballet and modern dancers, organized by Victor Melnikoff at Place des Arts. Tour participants will be able to buy tickets for the June 6 Jerusalem performance for $36, that includes a reception with the dancers. The regular price is $200.

Also on the itinerary is a visit to Canada Centre in Metulla, a Bedouin feast, sightseeing in Jerusalem and a boat ride on the Sea of Galilee.

The cost is $2,799 (Can.) from Montreal or Toronto, based on double occupancy, plus $73 airport tax, and includes return airfare via El Al, 11 nights accommodation, some meals and transfers. Extensions in Jerusalem or Eilat are available.

Add-ons are available from other Canadian cities.

For information, call Paula Mendelsohn, 1-514-486-9526.

CJC to maintain role in boosting Canadian unity

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Corespondent

VICTORIA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) took an active role in helping defeat the Quebec referendum and intends to step up future efforts to foster Canadian unity, said Goldie Hershon, national president.

"As Jews," she said, "we benefit from our good relations with Canada and we are doing all we can to preserve our Jewish life in Montreal."

Hershon spoke at a meeting of the Victoria community at the Empress Hotel during a recent retreat of CJC national officers held here. She was on a panel to answer questions about the Quebec situation.

Other panelists were Reisa Teitelbaum, chair of CJC's Quebec region; Jack Silverstone, national executive director; and Jack Jedwab, Quebec region executive director. Sid Tafler of Victoria, a former Montrealer, was moderator.

Billed as a national unity meeting on how Montreal Jews are coping, this was a typically laid-back Victoria meeting — no singing of O Canada, no flags, no stirring appeals to help the country, except for Hershon's statement that "we hope to travel the country more to hear your views on what we should consider for future action."

In responding to questions, the panelists said, among other things, that the Jewish community in Montreal is 95 percent in support of national unity; relations between the Jewish and francophone communities are generally positive; Quebec Jews are not going to "stand back" and wait for the separatists to dominate the next referendum, if there is one; Pierre Trudeau's recent attack in La Presse and the Montreal Gazette will have little effect on unity because his credibility in Quebec is not high.

In the audience of about 100, one former Torontonian asked if CJC has any specific plans to fight the next referendum — "It doesn't have to be plans A or B. Tell us if there's a plan Z," he urged.

A man from New Brunswick wondered if CJC was concerned that separation could wreck Canada's fragile economy; and a former Montrealer asked if CJC has considered the necessity of operating in a Canada that begins in Cornwall, Ont.

Chuck Waldman, who for a number of years has voluntarily run one-man campaigns for the United Israel Appeal (UIA) on Vancouver Island, noted that UIA, indirectly, helps fund CJC activities. He told The CJN that the Montrealers "presented a good case for a unified Canada by telling us of the strong support for the No side and the good relations that exist between French Canadians and Jews."

Hate crimes unreported, study finds

TORONTO — Crimes fuelled by hatred of a person's race, religion or sexual orientation are much more frequent than those recorded in official statistics, says a report by University of Ottawa criminologist Julian Roberts.

Only about one in 10 hate crimes is ever reported to the criminal justice system, says the report prepared for the Justice Department.

In addition, not all police forces record crimes based on hate; so even if an incident is reported, it may not be categorized as hate-motivated.

The report claimed the number of hate crimes in nine Canadian cities during 1993-94 was 60,000, far more than the 1,000 recorded by police.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL FOUNDATION OF TORONTO

Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto is responsible for the raising and administration of charitable funds in support of Mount Sinai Hospital and the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute's mission of patient care, medical research, and teaching. The Foundation has annual revenues in the order of $14 million through the benefaction of some 20,000 donors.

▲ Manager, Foundation Services & Donor Relations

This position reports to the President. Working closely with fundraising staff, you will use your multi-task organizational talents in developing, implementing and managing policies and procedures to support fundraising operations. This includes donor relations, information management, research and, most importantly, the integration of these elements to facilitate the processing, acknowledgement and stewardship of gifts and endowments. Your ability to liaise with top-level community, institutional and corporate leaders will prove invaluable in preserving and enhancing institutional relationships with donors.

▲ Development Officer, Major & Planned Gifts

Reporting to the Associate Directors, you will bring successful experience in identifying and developing prospects and in bringing projects to fruition. You have both the confidence and the capability to deal with donors and volunteers at all levels, including senior scientists and medical staff. Drawing on a pool of major donors, you will increase endowments, resolicit past givers, and identify and educate potential new donors. Superior communication, writing and editing skills will enhance your ability to develop and present proposals for funding.

Integrity, good judgement, and initiative are key attributes for success in these positions. You will have three or more years of experience in managing comparable functions in the charitable or private sector, such as in sales or client/investor relations. The ability to integrate the mission of the Hospital and Research Institute with the objectives of the Foundation is essential. You work well independently, are computer literate with database and other software, and have a university degree or equivalent. Knowledge of estate law and/or planned gift vehicles and strategies would be an asset.

Please submit your resume, including salary expectations, by February 22, 1996, to: Nicholas Offord, President, Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto.

MP stresses need to end Internet hate

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The cyberspace information highway should be devoted to harmony, not hate, said Dr. Rey Pagtakhan, Liberal MP for Winnipeg North.

Pagtakhan, who represents one of the most racially diverse constituencies in Canada, was speaking at the Empress Hotel, during a retreat of national officers of Canadian Jewish Congress. He said hate on the Internet is a "social cancer" which will spread and management of it is essential.

He said 11 percent of Canadians over age 16 have access to the Internet and more than eight percent of the Canadian population already have access to World Wide Web sites and can pick up messages from anywhere.

Parliament unanimously passed his motion last year calling for measures aimed at stopping the spread of hate propaganda on the information highway, but the motion has not yet been enforced, he said, adding that Justice Minister Allan Rock appears willing to act on it.

He said federal regulations already exist covering broadcasting and telephones and there is the Canadian Human Rights Commission — all equipped to handle illegal acts that spread hate. The law is quite clear, outlawing the wilful spread of hate, except for a private conversation between two people.

He said hate propaganda on the Internet is not new; just the method of distribution has changed.

He described hate as "an emotion of intense and extreme nature associated with devastation and vilification exercised against identifiable groups: race, religion, ethnic origin and color. Hate calls for them to be despised and deprived of respect because of their affiliation."

Pagtakhan conceded the magnitude of the problem of halting hate on the Internet because its source cannot be easily identified. He said people who oppose in principle the philosophy of spreading hate still want complete freedom of speech, as practised in most of the United States.

"But nothing is absolute, even freedom itself," and if Canadian regulations are adhered to, freedom of speech can be pursued in accordance with Canadian values.

"We must find a way," he urged, "to fight hate and have legislation to stop it while preserving freedom of expression."

The MP called on the computer industry and Internet purveyors to help develop a code of ethics. He also called for international agreements to solve the problem.

"It's not wise to be complacent," he warned, urging organization such as Congress to help develop the means to work out a solution.

Earlier in the session, Ken McVay, director of the Nizkor Project, which monitors and fights Internet anti-Semitism, showed examples both of the kind of hate material being used and of how Nizkor is responding.

He said that when Nizkor responded on the Net to some of the claims being made by anti-Semites, they stopped sending their messages. The big problem, he added, is tracing the source of the hate messages and that it's easy for purveyors to deny sending them.

Hilary Ostrov, Web master for Nizkor, said Ernst Zundel's hate messages originate in California, where there are no restrictions. Therefore, Canadian Human Rights Commission can't take action against him.

She said that other Canadian racists who use the Net in Canada are careful to observe Canadian laws as they relate to content. For example, they define the Jews as "special interest groups."

Hal Joffe, chair of the national community relations committee of Congress, said his committee is working on developing a policy to combat Internet hate. He said Canada has accepted that there are limitations on free speech through its regulatory bodies and "we don't need any more laws or regulations. We don't want to go through long litigation to get new laws."

Israeli, Palestinian students discuss peace issues

By STEVE MOCK
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — The first official meeting has taken place between Israeli and Palestinian student organizations.

On Jan. 24, members of Ofek, the student organization supported by the Labor party, and members of the Fatah Student Bureau met at the Seven Arches Hotel on top of Jerusalem's Mount of Olives, to discuss issues significant to the peace process.

Omer Egozi, chair of Ofek at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, said the peace process and the policy of the current government made such a meeting possible.

"Instead of fighting we are now conversing," he said. "Though we may have different views, we are now able to discuss them without violence."

His counterpart, the chair of the Fatah Student Bureau, agreed, saying, "Peace cannot be built between leaderships. Peace must be built between peoples."

Nissim Zvili, general secretary of the Labor party, opened the conference, stressing the role of the youth in ensuring the success of the peace process.

The goal of the meeting between the student groups was for each side to get a clearer picture of how the other side felt and to put a human face to these opposing opinions.

The aim is not to reach "a consensus or an agreement of any sort. We are here today to get to know each other," Egozi said. "The importance of this conference is its very existence."

The participants discussed some of the most difficult issues of the peace process: prisoners, settlements and the status of Jerusalem. Surprisingly, the two sides found a great deal of common ground, and frequently found few issues over which to argue.

Yael Goyski of Ofek moderated the discussion on the issue of settlements, where the mood was friendly. A Fatah participant even jokingly suggested that he recognized one of the Ofek participants out of uniform. After the discussion, phone numbers were exchanged.

At first, Goyski said, she was apprehensive about meeting her Fatah counterparts. "I was afraid at the beginning, but after the seminars I felt that they are like me – they are human. I think that we broke a psychological block."

The significance was not that Israelis were meeting with Palestinians, Egozi said. Israeli and Palestinian students have been studying together in Israeli universities for years.

"The unique point of this meeting," he said, "was that they were members of Fatah ... a terror organization. The idea was to try to get over psychological obstacles and to meet the people who were trying to kill us just months ago."

Jerusalem was the most difficult issue. In a hall with a window that framed the Temple Mount and the city skyline, Israeli and Palestinian students discussed whether it could some day be the capital of a Palestinian state.

"No one lost patience," observed Egozi. "But it was not very pleasant to hear some of the things they said. I'm sure it was the same for them when our people spoke."

He found it encouraging that no one feared engaging the other side. "It is important that we met to speak and debate, because when you don't speak, guns start to speak."

Despite differences, the two sides appeared comfortable together. "I'm sure many people's opinions changed," Egozi said. "For one thing, many of us didn't know that a person could be a religious Muslim and not extreme."

Refreshments were not served at the meeting because it was held during Ramadan, and the Muslim students could not eat.

"It is important that it was the students who met this time," said Egozi. "It is the students who will be ... leaders in a few years. If we meet and start to talk, it makes what we read in the newspapers real."

The conference concluded with short speeches by Faisal Huseinni and Knesset member Yael Dayan, who then answered questions about the current state of the peace process.

Huseinni said the conference was a necessary step towards ensuring an important role for Israel and the Palestinians in the region.

"We, Palestinians and Israelis, have a problem living on this land. On this land we have no oil. On this land we have no iron, no mines. But what we do have is minds."

Only in a state of cooperation, he said, can the talents of the next generation be fully realized to the benefit of the region.

Dayan referred to the personal contacts made at the conference. "When the time is right for you, there can be visits. You can take your Palestinian colleagues and friends to see things in Israel that are important to you. And you can ask to see things in the West Bank.

"It's not only important to understand. It's also important to remove ignorance. Lack of confidence and even hatred can be understandable, but it is fed by ignorance ... A group like this has an excellent chance to understand each other."

While Ofek and the Fatah Student Bureau have no immediate plans for a follow-up to the conference, all express a desire to continue the relationship between the two groups.

But for the most part, the future of the relationship will be in the contacts made between individuals.

Holocaust Awareness program held at McMaster

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A Holocaust Awareness program organized by four members of the McMaster University Jewish Students Association (MUJSA), had "the highest attendance of any program we have ever had at McMaster," reports campus advisor, Sheila Freedman.

The audience of about 150 "exceeded my wildest expectations," she said. "Twelve years ago, we would have been lucky if 10 or 12 people had turned up."

She was especially delighted, said Freedman, who has been advisor to the MUJSA for the past 13 years, to see so many black, Asian and East Indian students in attendance, along with the members of the local Jewish community and several parents who came in from Toronto.

The four students who took part in last year's Anguish to Hope Mission to Poland and Israel were Michelle Eidlitz, Stephen Neufeld and Allison Lidsky, all of Toronto, and Candace Wiseman of Dundas.

They showed slides of their trip and Lidsky spoke briefly of the impact the visit to Auschwitz had had on her, and the profound shock she had felt when she entered one room not knowing what it was, and on looking up, saw the shower head and realized she was in a gas chamber.

The evening's main speaker was survivor, Frank Junger, who was introduced by Wiseman.

Singles Registry - busier than ever ... making relationships come true

As he put down the phone, the message centre was flashing again. This time there were three more calls to return. It is fast approaching 8:00 p.m., eleven hours after the Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) opened that morning. "It has been an incredible month!" a tired but jubilant JSR director Rob Singer exclaimed. "We have signed up more members this month, than any other, in our three and a half year history." They are fast approaching the 1,000 member mark, a milestone even Singer had not expected to happen so soon.

What makes the JSR so successful is its concept of allowing singles to select for themselves who they would like to go out with. By reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles on each member, including photographs, members are provided with a clear "picture" of what their potential partner is all about. The JSR process is very much a two way street. You can be the selector or the selectee. Once both parties give mutual consent, phone numbers are then exchanged. The system enables members to make informed and quality dating choices, without relying on others to decide for them.

Another important factor which JSR members benefit from, are long office hours. The Registry office is open six days a week including evening hours and Sundays. A professional and dedicated staff ensures that JSR members are well taken care of on each visit. Members can make appointments as many times as they wish, and may choose up to three people each visit. A new customized computer system means faster connections. Most new JSR members are usually dating within one week of joining the service.

The JSR concept has been so successful that the service is averaging an engagement every seven and a half weeks. Hundreds of dates are set up each month, with thousands of selections made each year. With new members joining on practically a daily basis these figures are expected to rise even higher in the very near future.

What's even more interesting is that there are lots of things happening behind the scenes that will only be made public within the next few months. "We are not sitting still," remarked Singer. "Both current and future JSR members are in for an exciting 1996."

With intermarriage still on the rise, JSR accepts the challenge of being Toronto's number one Jewish dating service. It will continue to play a large role in the Toronto Jewish community.

Whether you are looking to meet soneone for friendship, a relationship, or even marriage, now is the time to register with the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. The phone number is 416-398-7068.

British intermarriage rate around 50 per cent: report

By SIMON ROCKER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON – Nearly half of British Jewish men under age 40 who are married or in steady relationships have a non-Jewish partner, according to a new survey of British Jewry.

The report, conducted by the Institute of Jewish Affairs, also showed that one in three British Jews did not belong to a synagogue.

And the survey indicated that British Jewish men intermarry more frequently than women.

The survey was based on questionnaires answered by more than 2,000 people. Its authors maintain that because of the size of the sample and the methodology used, the survey provides the most representative picture yet obtained of Britain's Jewish community.

For British Jewish men of all ages, 38 percent of those who are married or in steady relationships have a non-Jewish partner, according to portions of the report that have been released. It will soon be released in full. Among those under 40, the intermarriage rate rises to 44 percent.

For British Jewish women, the rate is estimated at between 20 and 25 percent.

In the United States, by comparison, the average intermarriage rate for Jewish men and women who have married during the past 10 years is 52 percent.

The gap in the intermarriage rate in Britain between the sexes has "clear implications," according to the report.

In the future, "either the rate in Jewish women will move towards that of men because of the unavailability of Jewish partners, or a higher proportion of Jewish women will remain unmarried," the survey said.

Figures on synagogue membership offer "no comfort" to the main Jewish religious bodies in Great Britain, the report also said.

Along with the finding that one in three British Jews do not belong to a synagogue, the survey found that more than 25 percent of the Jewish community had not attended synagogue during the previous year and that nearly half of the Jews under age 35 were not members of a synagogue.

Histadrut paper soon to close

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Davar Rishon will close at the end of the week, following the Histadrut's decision last Sunday not to give the newspaper additional financial support.

"We'll publish the paper to the very last moment as a live and active newspaper," said editor-in-chief Ron Ben-Yishai, "not only in the hope that something can still be done to save it, but because even facing death, one must die on one's feet."

The decision to close Davar Rishon came after a long, tense Histadrut executive session, when it transpired that all the attempts to find investors for the newspaper had failed.

Members of the paper's executive committee appeared, outlined the newspaper's business and editorial achievements, and requested another $6 million over the next two years, to get "breathing space" to negotiate with potential investors.

"Davar Rishon has a right to exist "as an independent, serious newspaper. The others are tabloids," Ben-Yishai said. "Ha'aretz, the only other serious paper, is business oriented. It is essential that there is at least one serious newspaper which has a humanist orientation and social sensitivity, like ours."

He noted that "most investors, like those who bought Ma'ariv and the Jerusalem Post, knew that even if their investment fell flat, the papers had enough real estate to cover the costs. In Davar, however, all the real estate was mortgaged a long time before I arrived on the scene."

The Histadrut, which decided to get rid of the paper when Haim Ramon was elected chair two years ago, agreed to pay $1 million a year for three or four years to support the paper, on condition that an investor was found to purchase its stock with the workers. During the past year, the Histadrut paid $35 million to cover the newspaper's debts, severance fees, and maintenance. But the decision to cut off further financial support constituted a death sentence for Davar Rishon.

"This is a sad day for Davar Rishon, but also for the Israeli press, which will remain with three newspapers, privately owned by three families constantly at war with one another," one worker said.

Third Way movement challenges Labor party

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Israel's newest political protest movement, The Third Way, is well on its way toward becoming a full-fledged party. Recently, its governing council voted unanimously to field a slate of candidates in this year's general election.

Composed mainly of disaffected members of the ruling Labor party, The Third Way hopes to win as many as a dozen seats in the Knesset, mainly at the Labor party's expense.

Barely capable even now of mustering sufficient votes to pass legislation, the Labor party is painfully aware of the damage The Third Way may inflict on its election prospects.

Late last year, in a bid to dissuade The Third Way from forming a party, the Labor party's secretary-general, Nissim Zvili, held talks with The Third Way's chair, Avigdor Kahalani (who is still technically a member of the Labor party). But Kahalani could not be budged.

The Labor party retaliated by barring Kahalani and his fellow maverick, Emanuel Zissman, also a Labor MK, from running in the party's upcoming primaries.

The rift between the Labor party and The Third Way had been growing before that fateful meeting. Last September, for example, Kahalani and Zissman defied the Labor party by voting against the Oslo 2 agreement.

Last month, the pair broke ranks with the party once again, supporting separate Knesset bills to enlarge Jerusalem's boundaries and for early elections.

The Third Way — which is to the left of Likud but to the right of Labor — was established in 1994 to lobby against an Israeli pullout from the Golan Heights.

In the summer of 1995, Kahalani and Zissman backed a bill which would have obliged the government to win a referendum by a two-thirds majority before making territorial concessions to Syria in peace talks. The bill was not passed, but The Third Way has continued its campaign to keep the Golan in Israeli hands.

The Third Way bears a strong resemblance to the short-lived Democratic Movement for Change (Dash), which was led by Yigal Yadin, a former chief of staff and a renowned archeologist.

In the 1977 election, Dash cut deeply into the Labor party's constituency, winning 15 seats and thus enabling the Likud to form its first government. Dash joined the Likud in a coalition and remained there until its breakup in 1981.

Nearly two decades later, The Third Way is poised to play the same spoiler's role as Dash.

Some members of The Third Way, however, are clearly uncomfortable with the idea of undermining the Labor party. Shortly after The Third Way announced its intention to contest the 1996 election as an independent entity, one of its founders, Mordechai Hod, resigned.

The Third Way's guiding motto is "peace with secure borders." Its overriding objective is to seize what it regards as the middle ground in Israeli politics. Third Way leaders believes that the Israeli electorate is disillusioned with the Labor party, yet wary of the Likud.

Like the Labor party, The Third Way favors territorial compromise and rejects the Greater Israel ideology of the Likud.

According to one of The Third Way's recent newspaper ads, "the two major parties — Labor and Likud — are being held captive by extremists, making it impossible to reach an agreement acceptable to the majority of Israel's citizens. Between the right's 'Not One Inch' policy and the left's 'Return to the 1967 Borders' there is a third way."

The ad, of course, is disengenuous, since the Labor party opposes a withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines. Be that as it may, The Third Way's peace plan is a hybrid affair, falling somewhere between the Labor party and the Likud.

Apart from hewing to the dogma that the Golan Heights cannot be given up, even in exchange for a peace treaty with Syria, The Third Way is of the view that the settlements on the West Bank should be concentrated into blocs containing about 90 percent of the Jewish population.

By all accounts, The Third Way's peace map would leave Israel with about half of the West Bank, a formula that the PLO would not and could not accept.

And The Third Way's insistence on retaining the Golan rules out any possibility of a deal with Syria.

Like the late Democratic Movement for Change, The Third Way has toyed with the notion of forming an alliance with the Likud should it win the election.

As well, The Third Way has considered aligning itself with two new parties, led by David Levy — the foreign minister in the last Likud regime — and by Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet Jewish activist.

Whatever happens, The Third Way is bound to make an impact in the next election. For that reason alone, the political scene is Israel is likely to be volatile.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 5

• A survey conducted by the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University disclosed that the Israeli public's image of Yasser Arafat had improved over the last year. One year ago, 43.7 percent of the people polled regarded him as more of a terrorist than a statesman. This year the figure was 34.3 percent.

Feb. 6

• Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu and Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan formally agreed to ally their parties for the upcoming general elections. Under the agreement, the two parties will maintain their independence. Eitan will be slotted into the second position on the combined party list. As well, eight positions of the top 40 will be reserved for Tsomet party candidates. (Eitan also agreed, later in the week, not to join a government headed by Shimon Peres if the latter were to win the election for prime minister.)

Feb. 7

• Ha'aretz reported that Prime Minister Peres visited IDF and South Lebanon Army troops near the town of Marj Ayun in southern Lebanon.

Feb. 8

• The government announced a series of measures in the spheres of religion, education, health and absorption, in an attempt to improve the quality of services to immigrants from Ethiopia.

Feb. 9

• Public opinion polls released today showed Shimon Peres far ahead of Benjamin Netanyahu in the race for prime minister and Labor ahead of the Likud-Tsomet alliance in the elections to the Knesset. The Dahaf Institute gave Peres a 51-36 percent lead over Netanyahu and Labor a 45-36 percent lead over Likud-Tsomet. Gallup gave Peres a 52-36 percent advantage over Netanyahu and Labor a 48-35 percent lead over Likud-Tsomet.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• Two thousand people were expected to attend the conference of the Makuya New-Zionist Movement of Japan.

Rabin assassination put peace process on fast track

By DAVID NEWMAN

It is now three months since the fateful night on which Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. While Israeli society has not fully recovered from this traumatic event, and probably will not do so for a long time, the affairs of state continue to play out their role under the forceful leadership of Prime Minister Shimon Peres and his government.

The peace process did not, as the assassin intended, come to a halt as a result of his murderous act. If anything, it has been speeded up. The full, and so far successful, implementation of the Oslo 2 accords has been carried out according to schedule.

Despite the skepticism from many within Israel, the Palestinians have undertaken their first shaky step into the world of democratic elections. And for most Israelis, the transfer of power to the Palestinians is an irrevocable fact, one which will not be changed even if a Likud government should come to power in the coming Israeli elections, to be held later this year.

Much of the negotiation surrounding the final territorial arrangement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority is based on attempts to include as many settlements as possible within Israel. However many settlements remain under Israeli control in the final arrangement, these are only likely to include 60 to 70 percent of communities which are located in relatively close proximity to the pre-1967 border, and which can be included within Israel through border redemarcation or even possible territorial exchange between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. It is incomprehensible how any agreement can include settlements located far into the interior of the region, physically disconnected from Israel, surrounded on all sides by the Palestinian political entity.

But it is precisely these settlements, such as Eilon Moreh, Shiloh and Kiryat Arba, which form the ideological hard core of Gush Emunim and the West Bank settler movement. Herein lies the geographical dilemma of the final stage negotiations.

Those settlements which could be influenced to evacuate through promises of adequate monetary compensation are located in areas which have a greater likelihood of remaining part of Israel, while the settlements which will be the most difficult to evacuate are in locations where there will be little choice but to evacuate if a final agreement is to be reached with the Palestinians.

Any attempt to remove these communities will be met with physical opposition on the part of the settlers and their supporters. But any attempt to leave them in situ will equally be met with fierce opposition on the part of the Palestinian authority. The idea, as reported recently, that Peres is interested in returning to a functional system, rather than the Rabin concept of territorial arrangement is doomed to failure if it leaves settlement exclaves scattered throughout the West Bank.

The traumas of settlement evacuation await us around the corner and fill many of us with fear for the expected scenes of intra-Jewish violence. It will be a price that we will have to pay for a final peace agreement. But the price of social dislocation will be great and it remains to be seen whether we as a society will come through it in one piece.

On the Syrian front too, the new government has attempted to push ahead with much vigor. It is not easy to understand the logic behind this move. If the Israeli populace is slowly giving its support to the Palestinian accords, it is hard to see, at this stage, how the government would succeed in getting a majority vote in favor of full withdrawal, including settlement evacuation, from the Golan Heights.

To many observers, it would appear more logical for the government to hold elections around what has already been achieved. A return to power with an increased majority would enable the government to push ahead with the negotiations over the final territorial arrangement with the Palestinians, as well as attempting to make a deal with the Syrians.

Of course, the big unknown is the outcome of the Israeli elections. Immediately following the assassination it was thought that the government would cash in on the feeling in the street and turn to the electorate. Only the rules of the Israeli electoral system are such that even "early" elections would have meant a wait of anywhere from four to six months, during which time the political rhetoric would return to what it was prior to the assassination.

Whenever held, this could well be the last election to be fought out over issues of peace, security and foreign affairs. A return of the present government, headed by the architects of the current peace process, Peres and Yossi Beilin, would allow another four years to build on what has already been achieved. It could well signal the transformation of Israeli political life, as we move, hopefully, into a post-conflict era, one in which the issues at stake will be our social, welfare and educational systems, a healing of religious-secular tensions and an attempt to build an even better and healthier society — one which is free of daily war and existential threat.

aftermath of Rabin's murder, Peres said, "I feel sympathy and support that I have never known. I feel that the young generation is preparing to put its stamp on the future of the country."

Peres went over the accomplishments of the government, citing continued immigration, reduction of unemployment, improvements in the educational system and road network, and reduction of terror. He promised that by the year 2,000 his government's policies would bring about "an end to war in the region" and a standard of living for Israelis that would be "no lower than that of France or England."

In a press conference held immediately after Peres', Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu welcomed early elections, saying they should have been held "a long time ago." Netanyahu said that these "are fateful elections in which each citizen will have to ask whom he trusts more to conduct the negotiations and maintain Israel's security. We will pose a clear alternative to the government's policy.

"Unlike the government, we will make sure Jerusalem remains undivided, that the Golan prospers under Israel's control, and that a Palestinian state is not established, but limited to self-rule areas. We will have to stabilize a situation gone out of control in a foolhardy, hasty, and reckless negotiating process with too small a return."

Netanyahu said the opposition would not quibble over the precise date of the elections. However, Likud officials strongly oppose two proposed changes in the election campaign law which they claim would put the opposition at a disadvantage .If the government insists on passing these laws, the Likud could withhold its support for whatever election date Peres proposes.

The controversial legislation would lift the ban on television appearances by candidates during the last 30 days of the campaign and would limit election propaganda to the state-financed television station.

While Netanyahu refrained from criticizing Peres' decision to call elections, other Likud MKs blasted the move. Uzi Landau and Limor Livnat accused Peres of trying to capitalize on the wave of support for Labor in the aftermath of the Rabin murder. "It's cynical exploitation," said Landau.

In his speech, Peres addressed these charges, saying: "I didn't create this reality (of support for Labor), and I am not about to deny it."

A weekend poll gave Labor a large lead despite last week's agreement between Netanyahu and Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan, which was intended to boost overall support for both parties. The poll, conducted by the Dahaf Institute, gave Peres 51percent to Netanayhu's 36 percent. Labor got 45 seats, while the combined Likud-Tsomet party received 36 seats – four less than the two parties had in the 1992 election. The upcoming vote marks the first time that Israelis will elect their prime minister directly – a change that the late Prime Minister Rabin fought hard to bring about.

In other election news, David Levy reiterated that he would not return to the Likud, and launched his campaign with a promise to address glaring social issues like poverty.

Former prisoner of Zion Natan Sharansky also jumped into the ring, announcing that his movement, Yisrael Ba'aliya, would become a political party and run in the elections. According to the Dahaf poll, Levy's and Sharansky's parties would garner 3 seats each.

Israeli rabbi meets Mandela

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG – Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau met last week with South African President Nelson Mandela at his Pretoria residence, where the two leaders compared notes on their periods of imprisonment.

Rabbi Lau said in an interview that he and Mandela "found a common language from the very first moment.

"We were both prisoners, he for 27 years and I for only six – between the ages of two and eight in concentration camps during the Holocaust," said the rabbi, who was on a three-day visit to South Africa.

Mandela's opposition to apartheid in South Africa was a major factor in his imprisonment.

"I told the president that the only difference was, as written in his book Long Walk to Freedom, that while he hoped for a better tomorrow, we didn't want to see the sun rise on another day, Rabbi Lau said.

"I also told him that now we could thank God we both had survived and were able to lead our people, as in Exodus, people who came from slavery to freedom."

Mandela said he was hoping to finalize arrangements with the Israeli Embassy to visit the Jewish state in the near future, Rabbi Lau said.

"I promised him the red carpet treatment when he comes," the rabbi added.

Mandela feels a great "warmth towards South Africa's Jewish community," Rabbi Lau said. "He told me of the contribution Jews had made in this country in all spheres."

Russian neo-Nazis face trial

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW – The trial of three members of a Russian neo-Nazi group known as the Werewolf Legion began last week in Yaroslavl, a city 130 miles north of Moscow.

The group, which was formed in the spring of 1994 in Moscow, includes about a dozen youths allegedly bent on carrying out acts of terror.

Two of the group's members on trial last week are facing charges of homicide, robbery and hooliganism.

The third defendant is the group's leader, Igor Pirozhok, who is accused of inciting racial hatred.

Pirozhok was charged under Article 74 of the Russian criminal code, which makes acts of inciting ethnic and racial hatred a criminal offence.

Shortly after it was organized, the Werewolf Legion allegedly attempted to set fire to the Olympic sports hall in Moscow, which was serving as the site of a messianic Jewish conference.

The group was also reported to have planned a series of arson attacks on movie theatres that were showing Steven Spielberg's acclaimed Holocaust film Schindler's List.

Prior to his arrest, Pirozhok said in interviews with several Moscow newspapers that "democrats, Yankees and kikes should be wiped out ruthlessly."

One of the legion's stated goals is the "final solution of the Jewish question by using radical methods."

The Moscow daily Izvestia said last year that the organization's ideology was based on "anti-communism, anti-Semitism, racial segregation and anti-liberalism."

Direct flights link Israel, Tunisia

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The first direct flights between Israel and Tunisia will take groups of Israelis to a religious celebration on the Tunisian island of Djerba for Lag b'Omer.

This was announced Sunday by Yossi Englander, chair of Yossi Tours, who reached an agreement with Tunisian Tourism Minister Sallah Moaui.

Yossi Tours signed an agreement to execute the flights with TTS, a large Tunisian tour operator and owner of Nouvel Air, a Tunisian charter company which is to carry out the flights.

The first three flights are to be on MD83s, carrying 167 passengers each, with flight time about 3 1/2 hours. The return flights are to be from Tunis, with passengers having the option of buying a flight ticket or a full tour package.

For the past two years, the company has brought Israelis to Tunisia on package tours via Rome and Malta. Englander said he hopes to initiate a weekly charter flight. The Lag b'Omer flight will cost $500 to $600 (US).

In other air news, Adria, the Slovenian national airline, has resumed direct flights between Ljubljana, the capital of the former Yugoslav republic, and Tel Aviv. The airline is represented here by Mirus Services.

THINKING OF SPRING

Until a few weeks ago, Israelis were wondering whether winter was really coming. They're wondering no more as Israel's sparse sprinklings have turned to heavy drenchings. In higher elevations, snow has fallen. Jerusalem experienced its first snowfall of the year and although the sheleg didn't stay, it caused traffic jams and sent people scurrying for shelter. Black, Jewish music featured at free concert

By PAULA CITRON
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – February is Black Heritage Month and as part of the celebrations, black soprano Denise Williams and Jewish pianist Brahm Goldhammer have put together a recital of black and Jewish music. The free noon hour concert will take place Feb. 15 at the Glen Gould Studio.

"We were two people, a black and a Jew, who worked closely together and we wanted to do something positive in the wake of the divisions that occurred between the black and Jewish communities over Showboat," Goldhammer says. (Showboat's opening in North York was marred by accusations of racism tinged with anti-Semitic overtones.)

Goldhammer, an accompanist and vocal coach, is a faculty member of the Royal Conservatory of Music and music director of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue.

Bridging divisions between communities

Antiguan-born Williams has sung in ensembles as diverse as the Caribbean Chorale and the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir. She is also an accomplished recitalist, equally at home singing opera or Broadway hits. Because of her involvement in Jewish choirs, Williams' command of Yiddish has been highly praised.

"I joined the Jewish Folk Choir because they were looking for professional singers," she says, "but I soon became enamored with the repertoire. I come from a strong church background so I was completely at home with the devotional nature of much of the music. I also loved the richness of the melodies."

Goldhammer became Williams' vocal coach three years ago and the two discovered that their cultures had many elements in common.

"There is a basis in spirituality, particularly Old Testament themes of suffering," Goldhammer says. "The idea of slavery and redemption runs strongly through both histories. For example, many spirituals use the metaphor of the children of Israel to refer to oppressed blacks, the same expression which for Jews has an emotional link with the Torah. In fact, the more we talked about the Showboat mess, the more things Denise and I found that we had in common, like similar experiences growing up as part of minority people," Goldhammer says.

"In setting up the program," Williams says, "we chose music written by either Jewish or black composers, folk music from both cultures and music written on Jewish or black themes by others."

Spirituals form the book ends of the concert, while Jewish traditional music is represented by Ladino and Yiddish folk songs. Williams has also tucked in a Calypso song from the West Indies. On the classical side, there is Maurice Ravel's Kaddisch, plus selections from Song of Songs by Toronto composer Srul Irving Glick. Black and Jewish influences come together in My Man's Gone Now from George Gershwin's Porgy and Bess.

Both Williams and Goldhammer stress the importance of the joint concert beyond its musical novelty.

"It may be an old cliche," says Goldhammer, "but music can be a harmonious bridge that brings people together, a place where they can share things in common. How many events in Toronto reflect a half-black, half-Jewish sensibility? We're probably the only thing, and this is sad because Jews and blacks have more in common than they do apart."

Eye on Arts

Film Fest Fundraiser: As it prepares for its fourth annual cinematic celebration, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival is hosting a fundraiser March 18 involving a screening and a party.

The film is Cafe Au Lait by French director Mathieu Kassovitz. A hit from last year's festival, Cafe Au Lait focuses on a comic ménage à trois: Felix, who is Jewish; Jamal, who is black Muslim; and Lola, who is pregnant. A comically volatile arrangement emerges when the three move in together.

The screening is scheduled for 7 p.m. at the Hyland Theatre, Yonge and St. Clair, Toronto. A party is planned afterwards at Tasker's, a nearby restaurant. The admission of $25 includes free food and one free drink. 416-324-8600.

In preparation for this year's festival (May 2 to 9), film festival staff have viewed more than 100 films. Already confirmed are films on the Jewish communities in Cuba, India and Greece; films on Yemenite Jews in pre-state Israel; several dramas from Poland, Israel, France and Russia; and some avant-garde short films. Festival passes purchased before April 1 are $70.

Daniel String Quartet: Music Toronto presents the Toronto debut of the Daniel String Quartet Feb. 29 at 8 p.m. in the Jane Mallett Theatre of the St. Lawrence Centre, Toronto. The performance includes quartets by Mozart, Shostakovich, Schubert and the Hungarian-born Israeli composer Odon Partos.

Founded in Israel in 1974 by Dutch, Soviet (Romanian) and Israeli-born musicians, the quartet took its name from Daniel House in the 19th-century Israeli village of Zichron Yaacov, a music centre built in memory of a pianist who died in the 1930s. It was the first official string quartet of the Israeli Army until its members moved to the Netherlands, where they perform in their own annual chamber music festival.

The composer Odon Partos was the founding principal violist of the Palestine Orchestra (later the Israel Philharmonic). He was also director of the Tel Aviv Academy of Music. The Daniel String Quartet is set to play the first of the composer's two string quartets, Concertino for String Quartet, which he wrote in 1934.

Royal Ontario Museum: The ROM's Judaica Gallery reopened earlier this month with a new installation of Jewish ceremonial art. More than 60 objects representing the rich traditions of Jewish life in post-medieval Europe illuminate aspects of Jewish religious culture from the 1500s to the present day. Items include circumcision kits to funerary society ritual cups, New Year's greeting cards and Passover plates.

Admission free with admission to the ROM. 416-586-8000.

Jazz & the Jewish Experience: Pianist-vocalist Fern Lindzon, guitarist Brian Katz and bassist Peter Telford present an afternoon concert in the Leah Posluns Theatre, North York, Feb. 18, 3 p.m. The program is an interesting mix of original contemporary jazz inspired by Jewish themes, traditional Klezmer music vocal jazz standards. Admission $5.

In Brief: The Paul Brooks Trio, featuring Marci Wilson, becomes the regular attraction at the Heritage Arms restaurant in Markham (905-294-1300) every Saturday evening as of Feb. 24. Wilson is an accomplished singer who also happens to be my sister. She and jazz guitarist Harris Lusher recently drew an overflow crowd to Graffiti's, a club in Toronto's Kensington Market.

The four-day event, Myth and Reality: A Canadian Landscape, is a call to action to save the Algoma Highlands and Algonquin Park from ecological destruction. It features numerous musicians, speakers and an exhibition of works of contemporary Canadian artists. Feb. 15 to 19, DeLeon White Gallery, 455 King St. W., Toronto. 416-597-9466.

Plan now for many tomorrows

TORONTO — At this time of year, we are bombarded with materials suggesting how you can best maximize your Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP).

But by age 71, an RRSP must be converted into a Registered Retirement Income Fund (RRIF), an annuity, or cashed in.

An RRIF has minimum annual payouts and must be completely dispersed before age 95. Consequently, as you approach age 65, your portfolio should be modified, in order to start to provide regular payouts of income.

Nathan Mechanic, investment advisor at Richardson Greenshields, says statistics on the life expectancy for 65-year-olds suggest that the money must last 25 to 30 years. He believes that the statement made by George Burns that "I don't buy green bananas" no longer applies, because seniors know that there will be many tomorrows.

Seniors already know that Guaranteed Investment Certificates (GICs) and bonds provide reliable and regular income to a retirement portfolio.

"The steady decline in interest rates, however, is making it harder to earn a good return from a portfolio of only GICs. To achieve higher returns, seniors today should have a portion of their portfolios in equities and in longer term bonds," Mechanic says.

"Persons approaching age 65 are generally uncomfortable with equities, with longer term bonds, and with any investment that doesn't have the word 'guaranteed' in it."

He says in order to set up a portfolio that can yield more than the 6¼ percent return available from GICs recently, and to sleep at night, seniors need to find an advisor who can understand their tolerance for risk and still create a portfolio that meets both their income needs and risk parameters. Other sources of income should also be discussed.

Generally, a portfolio balanced between stocks and bonds will provide a higher level of income and lower level of risk than an all-bond portfolio. Balanced mutual funds are an easy way for seniors to accomplish this.

Mechanic notes that in 1995, many balanced mutual funds returned more than 15 percent for the year. Including international mutual funds such as the Templeton Growth Fund in the portfolio is another way of achieving these goals.

A careful review of projected annual expenses is a prerequisite for planning, with consideration given to the increase in expenses that may occur if a person's health declines.

"Don't be afraid to ask questions of your advisor. The more you understand, the more capable you will be to make educated decisions about your future," he says.

Exhibit documents tragedy

In April 1994, after a plane carrying the presidents of Rwanda and Burundi was shot down, an episode of genocide erupted, forcing a million refugees to flee to Zaire. The American Joint Distribution Committee put together a coalition of Jewish organizations to raise money and send medical personnel to deal with the tragedy. For two weeks, Toronto photographer Stephen Epstein captured the work done by the team of dedicated people. His pictures are on display until Feb. 23 at Gallery 44, 401 Richmond St. W., Suite 120, Toronto. Call 416-979-3941

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Petra Travelogue: We left Aqaba at dawn. Squat buildings and palm trees receded into the desert behind us as our jeep spat up clouds of dust.

Travelling the King's Highway, we reached Petra in two hours, and took a light breakfast at the Petra Forum, a local hotel. Afterwards, we hired two fine horses – Ruba a noble white steed, myself a sturdy roan – and penetrated the mouth of the Siq, the serpentine arroyo or canyon that winds into the ancient city.

A trained guide, Ruba had been here many times before. Still, she seemed as awed as I, entering Petra for the first time. We rode in silence as the Siq became steeper and narrower around us. While most of the trail was in shadow, sunlight capriciously brightened patches of the colorful rock and danced in quivering patches on the ground. High above us, desert thickets protruded from the craggy rocks.

For almost three-quarters of an hour, the grating of horses' hooves on rock was practically the only sound we heard. Rounding a final bend, we confronted an astonishing sight: the towering and majestic facade of the Treasury, an architecturally splendid building carved into solid rock. At this point the Siq opens into a broad plaza, beyond which lies a city of 10,000 rock-hewn dwellings. The builders were the Nabateans, a reclusive biblical-era tribe, and the Romans who conquered them.

What made the site so desirable to both the Nabateans and the Romans was its seclusion. Strange and vast, this unique metropolis is ringed by mostly impenetrable mountains. Lost to Western travellers since the Crusades, rediscovered by a Swiss explorer in 1812, Petra is considered one of the wonders of the ancient world.

As in centuries past, the only way of getting into Petra is by foot, horse, camel or donkey-cart. Since the Israel-Jordan peace agreement of 1994, more than 100,000 Israelis and probably many more foreign tourists in Israel have crossed the newly opened border into Jordan, and most have visited Petra.

It has been only in the last half-century or less that the city has become accessible to sightseers. Before then, Bedouins camping in the stone dwellings would often greet travellers with rifle-fire. No one lives in Petra any more, Ruba told me. Several years ago, the government declared the site a national archeological treasure and transferred its inhabitants to a nearby village.

We inspected the monumental ruins for a couple of hours. When the sun became merciless, we ducked into a large rock chamber that had once probably been someone's living room; it was dark and chilly inside. To our surprise, a Bedouin boy had fashioned the ancient cubicle into a tiny variety shop. We bought two Pepsis in old-fashioned six-ounce bottles.

Re-emerging into daylight, we spotted a stout elderly Bedouin woman sipping tea. She was dressed all in black and sitting on a rock in the shade of some dwarfish trees.

Ruba seemed to recognize her at once. "Did I say there were no more Bedouins living here any more? No, that was wrong. She's the only one," she said.

The Old Woman of Petra looked possibly 600 years of age. She seemed somehow to embody all the old mysterious ways that live on in the Arabian desert. Her face was wrinkled and tattooed, her head kerchiefed, her teeth rotten, her black eyes reflecting an ineffable knowledge. Ruba spoke with her a moment in Arabic.

"She lives here all alone," Ruba told me as we walked away. "The rest of her tribe accepted the government relocation, leaving her behind. She says that Petra is her home and she doesn't want to leave."

A further revelation dispossessed me of the naive assumption that the old woman, living without modern conveniences, would know little of civilization beyond this petrified desert world. She had surprised Ruba by asking about – of all things – the performance of certain commodities on the New York stock market.

As Ruba explained, the woman's son had married a Swiss woman and had gone to work for a bank in Zurich.

"She's hoping his investments do well so that he can afford to bring her grandchildren here for a visit."

CITIBANK IN ISRAEL

JERUSALEM – Citibank's opening of a representative office in Israel last week is expected to speed up the arrival of other foreign banks here, Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel said.

At a press conference to announce Citibank's becoming the first major international banking institution to establish a presence here, Frenkel said the central bank is already aware of other institutions which are considering setting up shop.

MEDIOCRE GRADES FOR LOCAL BANKS

JERUSALEM – Israeli banks received mediocre ratings in the first-ever survey of the local banking scene performed by Moody's Interbank Service, a world leader in valuation of financial institutions.

The company has rated the banks according to Bank Financial Strength Ratings (BFTR), based on a scale ranging from A, which represents exceptional, to E, which is very weak.

The survey indicated that Israel Discount Bank and First International Bank have higher BFTR ratings than the country's other large banks.

Moody's rated Bank Discount and First International Bank (FIBI) C and Bank Hapoalim, Bank Leumi and United Mizrahi D+.

Israel's national hockey team upset by Greece

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In what must be considered a major disappointment, Israel dropped two matches to the Greek national team in the first-ever international hockey tournament held in Metulla.

The losses eliminated Israel from the chance of qualifying for the 1998 winter Olympics in Japan as well as for this year's International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Group C championships.

Israel did manage to get some glory in the national team's home debut when it romped over the visiting Turks by a 19-0 margin.

The Greeks, who also hammered Turkey 19-0, were the only one of the three teams to qualify for the world championships and they remain an Olympic hopeful.

Israeli team captain Oded Orgil, an Israeli-born defenceman who lives in Toronto, said Israel lost despite having upgraded its team. However the Greek squad, which Israel managed to beat in past tournaments, were much improved thanks to the infusion of about 12 or 13 Greek players living in Canada. Most play in the Metro Toronto and Ontario Junior A leagues (Tier II), as well as in Ontario industrial leagues. They're backstopped by a University of Toronto goalie, he added.

Bolstered by that lineup, the Greeks handled Israel 4-1 in the opening game of the tournament — the world championship qualifier.

The Greeks played a Canadian-style "dump and chase" game with lots of physical contact and that apeared to unnerve Israel's Russian-born players, Orgil said. The ex-Europeans on the Israeli squad didn't like getting hit and they retaliated with their sticks. That gave the Greeks plenty of power play opportunities and they capitalized, jumping into a 3-0 first period lead.

They added a fourth goal in the second — also with the man advantage — and Israel got its lone marker on a shot from former Leningrad winger Benny Shapiro.

Orgil believes that talent-wise, the Israelis were on a par with the Greeks, but the Israelis "weren't prepared to sacrifice," to take a hit to make a pass and that cost them dearly.

"They seemed a little hungrier," he said.

In Game 2, the Israelis toyed with the Turks and ran up the score to register a 19-0 win. Soviet-born goalie Boris Amromin got the goose-egg.

Greece then duplicated Israel's score, beating the Turks 19-0, officially ending Israel's hopes for advancing to the IIHF Group C event.

Game 3 saw a rematch with the Greeks in the Olympic-qualifier match but Israel "didn't come prepared to play," Orgil said.

Some of the Euro-Israelis were wary, if not puck-shy, after the physical style employed by Greece in Game 1. Israel fell behind 4-0 after only six minutes and Israeli goaltender Evgeny Gusin, who had stints in the Colonial and East Coast Hockey Leagues, pulled himself from the twine tent in a bid to wake up his teammates.

After Israel narrowed the margin to 4-1 and then 5-2, Greece broke the game wide open late in the second period and cruised to a 10-2 victory.

The game was marred by plenty of penalties, Orgil said, due to Israeli frustration, chippy play by the native-born Greeks and bad officiating by the Swiss ref.

One Greek submarined sabra defenceman Ran Oz, who got up and began pummelling the first Greek player he could find. (He turtled.) Oz got a game misconduct.

Even Orgil was frustrated by the ref's bizarre calls and was ejected from the game for yapping with only a minute or two to play.

Despite the losses, Orgil was impressed with Metulla's recently-completed Olympic-size rink, the jewel in Metulla's Canada Centre recreation complex. The complex was built with funds transferred to Metulla through the United Israel Appeal.

Unfortunately, the Israeli media did not give the tournament much play and the approximately 1,000 seats were never full, he said. Orgil put that down to poor publicity and lack of marketing by the Russian-run Israel Ice Hockey Federation.

Hoopsters to go head-to-head

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — Hoops lovers, set your VCRs now.

At 1:30 p.m. on Feb. 17, NBC will televise a hardcourt matchup between the most famous Catholic college in the world, Notre Dame, and the University of Connecticut, rated among the top five teams in college basketball.

What makes the event unique is that both squads feature prominent Jewish stars.

Leading the Fighting Irish is freshman Doug Gottlieb, wearing 44, while the UConn Huskies will rally around point guard Doron Scheffer, a senior who wears No. 11.

It's a six-foot rookie and a team struggling to reach the .500 mark versus a six-foot-five veteran and a team with a good chance to win the national championship.

In the teams' first meeting on Dec. 6 at South Bend, Ind., UConn won easily as Scheffer, a native of Ramat Efal, Israel, led the scoring with 23 points. He sunk four of seven three-point shots, added eight rebounds, four assists and three steals while committing only two turnovers.

Gottlieb came off the bench to play 22 minutes, score four points, dish out three assists and commit one turnover against the Huskies' pressure defence.

The Tustin, Ca. resident has become a starter since then, averaging 28.7 minutes per game. He's the team's fourth-leading scorer with a 4.8 average, is first in assists (105) and steals (31) and also, as is common for a point guard, first in turnovers (45).

This season, Gottlieb is shooting .345 from the floor, .278 from three-point range and only 42 per cent (21 of 50) from the free-throw line, where the Irish are the worst in the Big East Conference.

The Irish lineup has only one senior starter and five of its top seven players are freshman or sophomores.

It's an entirely different situation for the high-flying Huskies, who start four seniors and a junior. Shooting guard Ray Allen, a junior, is forecast to be a top five pick in the NBA draft and a pro career could be in the cards for Scheffer, according to Marty Blake, head of scouting for the NBA.

'Israeli iceman' cometh

Blake, who is Jewish and has been involved with pro basketball for nearly 50 years, said, "[Scheffer] can play in the NBA. Point guards are born, not made. He can pass, he can shoot and he's got a Yiddishe kopf. He's a smart player.

"He could be making $250,000 a year playing pro ball in Israel right now.

"People are questioning his speed, but not our NBA people. As for speed being a factor, I have a two-word answer: Larry Bird."

After averaging 11.9 and 10.6 points per game (PPG) and serving mainly as a feeder for current NBA players Donny Marshall and Donyell Marshall, the "Israeli iceman" has stepped up his point production this season. He's averaging 16.1 PPG, second to Allen's 23.5; he's shooting .428 from the field, a fine .403 from three-point range and .849 from the foul line. He's averaging 4.7 rebounds, leads the team with 144 assists and has committed only 64 turnovers.

Scheffer has outscored Allen in several games and has had one "triple double" with 10 or more points, rebounds and assists.

As for whether Scheffer has the physical ability to guard the NBA's slick point guards, Blake said, "Let the $1 million-a-year coaches figure that out. I just say he can play in the NBA. When you get in the NBA, you get real coaching and you play 100 games against the best players in the world.

"You don't get faster, you get quicker; you learn how to steal a step or two, to anticipate another player's moves. And Doron is very, very smart. I like him very much."

"I can't predict what round he'll be drafted in," Blake said, "but I remember 12 teams passing on Karl Malone (a perennial NBA all-star)."

Scheffer is one of the premier players who's been invited to attend the NBA draft on June 26 so he can be shown on television when he's picked by his new team.

TORONTO — Our story last week, Jewish Schools Prepare for Hockey Tourney, failed to indicate that three of the four schools have female players on their rosters.

The tournament, which runs from 9 a.m. to 3. p.m. on Feb. 19 at the Forest Hill Arena, has been named the Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament.

Quick use of CPR saved swimmer's life

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shirley Shulman and Allon Hollander just happened to be in the right place at the right time — and Ben Richman can thank his lucky stars for it.

One afternoon a little over a month ago, Richman was swimming laps at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) pool when he blacked out.

"The next thing I know, I was supposed to have left this world and now I'm back," he said.

Though he couldn't have known it at the time, what happened when he lost consciousness was a story of cool professionalism and calm under pressure when it appeared that Richman's life was slipping away thanks to a heart attack.

Hollander, the lifeguard on duty at the time, noticed that Richman was in distress and had grabbed onto a lane-divider in the pool's shallow end. Immediately realizing something was seriously wrong, he called in a "code red" — an indication to the BJC fitness staff that there was a life-threatening, emergency situation in the pool.

Shulman, director of the women's health club, was in the locker room at the time. Hearing the emergency call, she immediately headed through the women's shower room to the pool. There she saw Hollander in the water next to Richman, holding him up. With the help of a third staffer, they pulled the unconscious heart-attack victim out of the water.

"Within seconds of taking him out of the water, we initiated CPR (cardiopulmonary resuscitation)," Shulman recalled.

Using a special mouthpiece that fit over Richman's mouth, "Allon breathed in and I did the chest compression, very much like you see in ER except this was the real thing," she said.

After a few minutes, officers from the fire department, the first of three rescue crews, arrived on the scene and took over the CPR work. Three or four minutes later, an ambulance crew arrived.

Using a tube pushed down Richman's throat (to force air into his chest) and employing chest compression, "they were getting him and then losing him. It was tenuous at the time. They got a pulse that was very weak and then they lost it," Shulman said.

A paramedic crew was also summoned and they administered epinephron, an adrenaline drug administered intravenously that stimulates the heart.

But still there was no response. At that point, after Richman had been removed from the wet pool deck and taken to the aquatics office, the paramedics deployed defibrillators — electric shock pads "where the body literally goes off the floor," Shulman said.

After two or three electric shocks, they finally got a faint, regular pulse.

When he was finally stabilized, Richman was taken to Branson Hospital for recovery.

A former instructor in CPR, Shulman said that during the crisis situation, "I found I reacted calmly. I knew this had to be done, do it. I remembered what I'd been taught ... and Allon did too and it just came together."

As they departed the scene, one of the fire rescue crew turned to the crowd that had gathered and said "whoever did the CPR saved this man's life." Although the full impact of what they'd done didn't sink in at the time, later, when they had time to digest it, "we had the warm fuzzies," Shulman said.

Shulman's and Hollander's life-saving intervention didn't go unnoticed as the North York chapter of the Heart and Stroke Foundation recently presented them with their Lifesaver Award.

As for Richman, he's back at home now, recovering and eternally grateful to Shulman and the others.

"Is there anything I can say that measures up to what they did for me? They saved my life," he said.

New detox technique may help drug addicts

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Bethlehem will become the world's first town to be weaned completely off drugs, using a new form of treatment that will reduce heroin and cocaine use to the point where selling drugs will no longer be profitable, its proponents say.

The project by CITA, an international centre for treatment of drug addiction, is based on an ultra-rapid opiate detoxification (UROD) process which can wean an addict painlessly off physical drug dependency in six hours. This is followed by six months of psychotherapy.

CITA operates in Israel and a dozen countries in North America, Europe and East Asia.

"This is a new concept we have introduced," said CITA founder, Dr. Juan Jose Legada of Spain.

The speed of the detoxification process allows CITA to treat up to 6,000 patients a year and allows for mass simultaneous detoxification of entire communities. Until now, when an individual was treated independently of other drug users in his neighborhood or even in his own family, the chances were great that he would return to the habit.

"To treat a town is to stop drug trafficking," and this will reduce the rate of recidivism, Legada said.

Claudette Habash of Caritas, the Vatican-based welfare agency which is helping fund the project, said drug use among Palestinians has increased "at least four times since the 1970s," but there are no clear figures, as shame often compels families to keep addicts hidden. The new treatment — painless, fast and free to patients — is expected to lure them out of the closet.

Habash conservatively estimates that there are 150 addicts in Bethlehem and 300 to 400 among Palestinians in Jerusalem. The drugs come mostly from Syria and Lebanon, she says.

Bethlehem's drug problem came to light six years ago when thieves stole gold teeth from corpses in the Latin cemetery. Mayor Elias Freij said at the time that the purpose of the thefts was to fund the thieves' drug habit.

Dear Jesse,

I am a top level executive in a large corporation. I have been offered a transfer by the company as they are moving their head office. I cannot turn them down as it is an advancement for me.

My problem is my father. He is well into his 70s and he was quite independent while my mother was alive. Since her death six months ago, I find my father has a become reclusive person. He is not able to care for himself at all. I have been doing more and more for him. His doctor says it's a depression and that he should pull out of it with the help of some medication. I don't think it's as simple as that.

How can I leave in two months knowing my father is in this state? I have no siblings to depend on for his care. What is available for my father so that he can maintain his independence that seems to be rapidly disappearing?

M. H.

Dear M. H.,

Have you discussed your dilemma with your father? There are options that he might be interested in pursuing with you, while you are still here.

Family Link, available in Montreal at Jewish Support Services for the Elderly and similar programs offered by community agencies in other cities will provide the link between you and you dad. Although the service may vary the basic concept is to ensure that there is someone close by who can be reached in case of a concern. Services can be arranged quickly.

Another possibility is a seniors residence that provides food and housekeeping. Your father may be interested in moving into a place which would reduce his responsibilities and provides for socialization.

Many communities offer support groups for adult children of the frail elderly. You might discover other options and receive the support you need. However, it is important that you respect your Dad's decision and help him through it.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

EGGPLANT FETTUCINI

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY..
HERB CAPLAN SELLS FOR LESS
1111 Weston Road S of Eglinton 767-1655

2 eggplant
1/2 lb. fettucini
1/2 lb. ricotta cheese
2 lg. cans seasoned tomato sauce salt & pepper to taste dash nutmeg
grated parmesan cheese

Peel eggplant and slice lengthwise. Lightly brush with olive oil and broil on each side until browned. Boil noodles and drain. Mix ricotta cheese with noodles, salt, pepper and nutmeg. Place small amount of cheese mixture on end of each eggplant slice and roll up. Pour half tomato sauce in 9x13" casserole. Lay eggplant rollups in casserole and cover with remaining tomato sauce. Sprinkle with parmesan cheese. Bake 30 mins. at 350°.
For low fat - use low fat cottage cheese or ricotta; for wheat allergy - use corn fettucini.

The Last Word

Renewing your RRIF?

It's always important to get the best deal available. In today's low interest rate market, the financial institutions will often offer higher than normal rates to get the business. You must seriously consider what you are giving up to get these rates. For example, quality, ongoing professional advice and service. This indeed has value. Another consideration is alternative investment strategies which may prevent the erosion of capital in your RRIF. Even though you may get a better interest rate, it may not be high enough to offset the amount of income coming from your RRIF, some of which may be capital. We suggest you think twice and consult with us. There is no cost involved.

Ancient wisdom. Fresh ideas.

Exploring the depth of our history. The spirit of our culture. The purpose of today.

This is Kolel.

Building on the richness of knowledge that is so much a part of Judaism, Kolel looks ahead by delving into the past.

A new way of looking at all things Jewish. A uniquely Jewish way of looking at all things anew.

"I feel like I'm on a journey that I've been on before, but everything looks new and exciting."

This is Kolel.

Study that begins with what it means to be Jewish. And ends with what it means to be alive.

Grounded in tradition. With the freedom to let your spirit soar.

Roots. And wings.

This is Kolel.

Young and old. Men and women.

Jews who attend synagogue regularly. Jews who haven't been to shul in years.

These are the people who fill Kolel classes.

Everyone welcome. Everyone comfortable.

No barriers. No limits.

Open to all points of view.

"Kolel is such a wonderful blend of students who are searching for substance, understanding, community, and spirituality."

Egalitarian in principle. And practice.

Kolel students ask questions, discuss, debate.

And learn.

Sometimes in class, sometimes over a cup of coffee after class, we find the answers that make sense of life today.

Kolel courses are designed for both general and advanced levels, from a modern progressive Jewish perspective, while remaining faithful to a tradition of serious text-based study.

"I started with 'Doing Jewish' and I was hooked on Kolel's energy and fresh approach. Now I'm onto my fifth course and it's still the highlight of my week."

Our program includes lectures, full semester courses, in-depth seminars, retreats and one-day Hebrew marathons.

"Jewish culture, history, and philosophy are among the richest and most fascinating in the world. Kolel presents it in the most authentic way possible."

Subjects have included:

Minicourses:	Judaism & Spirituality	Relationships and Sexuality
	High Holiday workshops	Hebrew Literacy
Semester courses:	"Doing Jewish"	A re-entry point for those seeking a modern and meaningful Jewish life; the whys as well as the hows.
	Jewish Ethical Living	Jewish answers to today's perplexing moral challenges.
	Women in the Torah	Heroines you didn't learn about in Sunday school.
	The Art of Jewish Prayer	Comparing Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and Reconstructionist models while delving into the meaning and methodology of prayer.
	Sources and Texts	A rich taste of the contents and contexts of our most central books: Torah, Talmud, Midrash, Siddur, Zohar and more.
	Survey of Jewish History	Political and sociological analysis to make yesterday's history understandable today.
	Torah Study	An on-going advanced class in Hebrew looking at traditional commentators deepened by modern psychological, anthropological, sociological and historical insights.

As Director of Kolel, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein brings a distinguished background to the centre, both as an accomplished academic and as a respected congregational rabbi.

Dynamic, caring, and committed, Rabbi Goldstein has helped build Kolel into a community that is at once energized and energizing. She is an articulate and passionate teacher with a nation-wide reputation.

"Rabbi Goldstein immediately put me at ease, and questions were always welcome. She has been a real source of inspiration."

The Toronto area is blessed with talented and learned educators and Rabbis, many of whom teach courses at Kolel. This gives you the opportunity to learn from a variety of scholars with a wide range of ideas and subjects.

Election already nasty

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
and LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Stung by a Likud allegation that he would agree to the repartition of Jerusalem, Prime Minister Shimon Peres angrily struck back last week. He issued a statement at the weekly cabinet meeting declaring that the charge is not only baseless, but also constitutes "incitement," given public sensitivity to the future of the city.

Meanwhile, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert again claimed that academics Yair Hirschfeld and Ron Pundak are conducting secret negotiations on Jerusalem with the Palestinians.

Pundak and Hirschfeld received the green light from Yossi Beilin to discuss the future of Jerusalem, Channel 1 reported last week. This has been consistently denied by the government.

"The fact that the talks are taking place is not being contested," Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu said at the capital press conference at which Olmert made his claim. "What is under dispute is the question of whether they are separate talks by academics or whether they are under Beilin's supervision. We say with complete certainty that they are laying the ground for [an Oslo-style] agreement."

He compared the situation to the division of Berlin, saying: "Physical division follows political division as sure as night follows day."

Peres's statement, read to reporters by cabinet secretary Shmuel Hollander, declared: "Following charges that the prime minister and the government intend, as it were, to divide Jerusalem and with regard to secret talks allegedly being conducted on the matter the prime minister wishes to emphatically and unequivocally state that he has no

Marx committee holds hearings

Consensus that bylaws need to be changed

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The presenters at a special all-day hearing in Montreal agreed that it was a black mark on the history of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) that shook the community's confidence.

There was also consensus that the bylaws on elections and accreditation must be more explicit.

But the presenters differed in attaching blame for the fact that delegate registration at the CJC Plenary Assembly last May disintegrated into a near riot.

Quebec Superior Court Judge Herbert Marx and his six committee members presided over seven hours of presentations by nine individuals. The tone was frank and at times emotional. In addition to the oral presentations, these nine and others made written submissions to the committee.

The presenters basically fell into two camps: plenary officials who felt the rules had been shamelessly bent and/or broken by supporters of presidential candidate Thomas Hecht; and Hecht defenders – including Hecht himself – who maintained he had to use all means available within the letter of the law because CJC insiders, including most plenary committee chairs, were openly supporting his opponent, Goldie Hershon, and conducting a smear campaign against him.

Hal Joffe, chair of the plenary steering committee, testified in his brief: "It appears to me that the entire registration process was doomed to fail because we assumed that members of our community would act honestly ... We must now begin to operate more formally with elaborate rules, in order to avoid the abuse of those who would subvert our process."

Hecht, however, charged that he was the victim of a "conspiracy" to "vilify" him and to obstruct his supporters from voting. "Many dozens of voters potentially supporting" his candidature were deliberately "disenfranchised" by CJC staff and laypeople, he said.

Hecht saw a conflict of interest in Hershon's

CANADA

Dubin Steps Down

OTTAWA — Ontario Chief Justice Charles Dubin is leaving the bench and returning to private law practice, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien announced last week.

His resignation comes a few months short of his 75th birthday.

Dubin served on several public inquiries, including a royal commission on drug use in amateur sport, as well as one on air safety in Canada.

Hebrew Course

OTTAWA — The University of Ottawa's Modern Languages Department, will offer a three-credit program in Hebrew beginning this September. This is a change from the traditional six-credit program over the full academic year offered since its beginning.

In addition to learning intermediate Hebrew, reading, writing and conversation, the students will be introduced to the study of contemporary Hebrew poetry, literature and culture. New computer software for the language lab has been also implemented for independent studies.

ISRAEL

EU Wants Role in Peace

JERUSALEM — A delegation of the European Union told Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres that it was interested in helping with the peace negotiations between Syria and Israel.

Talks between Israeli and Syrian teams, along with U.S. officials, are set to resume Feb. 28 at Wye Plantation in Maryland.

Peres praised the European Union's efforts and proposed that the European delegation meet with U.S. officials in order to coordinate positions on aid to the Middle East and on the peace process.

Inflation Down

JERUSALEM — Israel's inflation rate in 1995 was 8.1 percent, the lowest since 1969. Inflation in 1994 was 14.5 percent.

A slowdown in housing price increases and a decline in the prices of fruits and vegetables accounted for the low inflation rate.

Triplets Born

JERUSALEM — Two sets of triplets were born last weekend in a Nahariya hospital, in northern Israel.

Both sets, one of which is all girls, the other two boys and a girl, were reported to be healthy.

The mothers, who both delivered their babies through Caesarian section, had undergone fertility treatments.

WORLD

WJC Rejects Swiss Survey

GENEVA — The World Jewish Congress has rejected a survey released by the Swiss Bankers Association which concluded that Swiss banks were not holding vast sums belonging to Holocaust victims.

The survey indicated that the banks had some $32 million in as-yet unclaimed accounts that might have belonged to Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

EU, Palestinian Trade Deal

BRUSSELS — The European Union is willing to reach a trade agreement with the Palestinian Authority, according to EU officials.

At a recent meeting here, the 15 EU foreign ministers invited the European Commission, the union's executive body, to start discussions with the Palestinian Authority about the accord.

Trademark Rights

AMSTERDAM — Two European organizations, both established to preserve the memory of Anne Frank, have been entangled in a legal dispute over the use of the trademark "Anne Frank" name.

The Anne Frank Fund, founded by Frank's father, Otto, in 1966 in Basel, Switzerland, is suing the Anne Frank Foundation, claiming commercial exploitation of Anne Frank's name.

A district judge in Zurich decided that the two parties must try to settle the suit out of court.

Kielce Pogrom

NEW YORK — The president of Poland has given his support to a Jewish commemoration of the 1946 Kielce pogrom and to the return of property once owned by Jews and the Jewish community.

President Aleksander Kwasniewski made the pledges when he met with World Jewish Congress vice-president Kalman Sultanik.

Kwasnieski wants to create a new chapter of ties between Poland and Jewish communities around the world.

Polish Jew's Bequest

LOS ANGELES — A Polish-born Jewish woman who worked as a librarian for 32 years has left an unexpected bequest of $592,000 to the University of California at Los Angeles for Holocaust and Jewish studies.

Antonina Babb, who died in 1994 at the age of 75, designated UCLA's chair in Holocaust Studies as the beneficiary of her estate, consisting largely of her house in Santa Monica, Calif.

Essay Contest

NEW YORK — The University Student Department of the World Zionist Organization and the Aliya Program Centre are sponsoring an essay contest where the first prize is a free round-trip ticket to Israel.

The contest is open to university students only. All entries must be received by March 1.

For more information call 1-800-27-ISRAEL.

Russian Talmud

Zundel Blocked

NEW YORK — The University of Massachusetts has taken steps to deny a prominent Holocaust denier access to its World Wide Web site, according to the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Ernst Zundel, 57, a German-born resident of Toronto, succeeded in circumventing a German government effort to block access to Internet sites promoting racial hatred.

The Wiesenthal Centre commended the University of Massachusetts for ordering the graduate student who posted the messages for Zundel on the university's Web site to remove them.

Responsibility.

PQ minister urges young Jews to stay in Quebec

'We must respect the minorities,' says Menard

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal's bilingualism and multicultural character are assets that should be promoted, as long as French remains "a living presence and not just a tourist attraction," Serge Menard, Quebec's new minister of state for metropolitan Montreal, told an audience of Jewish young adults.

"We know we must respect the minorities as we would have wanted to be" in Canada, he said. Moreover, Quebec can benefit from making Montreal "an international city."

He urged young Jews to stay because their education and entrepreneurial spirit is needed, but CJC youth co-chair Robert Presser added: "If partition is becoming a popular rallying cry, it is to fill the void created by the lack" of new ideas from the federalist camp.

Menard faced persistent questions from the audience on what exactly he would do to attract nervous investors and good jobs back to Montreal.

"I would tell them the truth, what the mayor of Westmount [Peter Trent] told me: that it is possible to live in Montreal in English if they want to ... Their kids have the right to go to English schools for six years at least."

He admitted, he could not name "off hand" one company that offered no concessions on Bill 101 or easing of the political tension that many in the overflow crowd believe would reverse the decline in Montreal's economy.

Menard insisted that the majority of French Quebecers do not want separation, but sovereignty and "partnership" with Canada. "Separation and sovereignty are not the same ... the majority of francophones, and probably anglophones, want some change in Canada."

'Sense of uncertainty'

The government's priority now is gaining control over the public finances and stimulating the economy, Menard said.

The panel discussion, entitled After the Vote: What does the future hold for Quebec's young adults? was sponsored by FEDERATION CJA's Young Adult Division (YAD) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) youth committee.

YAD chair Barry Pascal said the Jewish community feels "a powerful sense of uncertainty ... A lot of people are asking will my kids be here in five or 10 years?"

However, his comments about the status of English and the legality of a unilateral declaration of independence drew skeptical noises, including one shouted expletive.

The most applause went to John Parisella, former Robert Bourassa chief of staff and now a vice-president of BCP, who blamed the prospect of another referendum for the city's economic woes.

"As long as the threat of sovereignty is there ... and the PQ government refuses to consider the possibility of making Canada work, we will have a problem in Quebec," he said.

Easing some of the restrictions on English schooling would help bring business back and serve as a "concrete gesture" to anglophones that they belong here, he said.

Notre-Dame-de-Grace Liberal MNA Russell Copeman suggested that, if there is fear among anglophones, it is due to the "exclusionary nationalism" of the sovereigntists.

Law on desecration urged by study

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A study on hate crimes suggests the Criminal Code ought to be amended to create a new offence that would refer specifically to the desecration of religiously-significant property.

"These offences would replace the application of mischief as a charge in cases of hate crimes directed at synagogues and other places of religious worship," the report suggests.

The report, titled Disproportionate Harm: Hate Crime in Canada, argues desecrations of synagogues and cemeteries are much more serious than simple vandalism.

"The desecration of a tomb is not the same criminal act as the spray-painting of a subway train. Attempting to respond to the former act by classifying it in the same Criminal Code section as the latter is inevitably going to lead to a trivializing of what is a serious crime. Nor can this additional element of harm be adequately recognized at the time of sentencing."

From the editor's desk

A chat with Peres

The notes on my desk are still open to the events of the first day of the Sixth International Conference of the Jewish Media in Jerusalem. At 8:30 in the evening, Prime Minister Shimon Peres held a press conference with us. Security arrangements were very strict. We were warned: No cameras or electronic equipment were permitted.

The prime minister strode into the room, smiling, obviously relaxed. He was upbeat, confident, self-assured. At times he even seemed bemused, delighted by the "softer" questions from this visiting press corps which behaved undoubtedly more deferentially and less aggressively than the local one to which he is accustomed.

I reproduce my notes of the questions and his answers.

Q: Mr. Prime Minister you have said that "the peace train will stop" if Yasser Arafat does not rescind the Palestine National Council [PNC] covenant. Will they do what is necessary?

A: If the PNC is unwilling, he [Arafat] can dismantle it. It is inconceivable that he will belong to two organizations, one of which seeks peace and the other of which calls for our destruction. He has made a commitment to peace with Israel before the entire world. It is inconceivable that he will not honor that commitment.

Q: Were you aware of the policy by the Magen David Adom regarding the blood donated by the Ethiopians?

A: I am very sorry for the injury we committed to them. I ask them to accept my apology. What happened [regarding the discarded blood] was not so much a result of policy as it was a result of bad judgment and mistake. I'm sure nothing was done intentionally; but a hurt is a hurt. By the same token I want to say, that throwing stones at the police was a terrible mistake on their part.

Q: Is there anything more which Israel can do to obtain Jonathan Pollard's release?

A: Our relations with the United States are not based on mutual pressure, but on mutual understanding. I sent a letter to President [Bill] Clinton about Mr. Pollard. The president is aware of our position.

Q: The protest by the Ethiopians was not only about their blood. It was also about the treatment they have received regarding housing, jobs and education. Why have they been treated so poorly?

A: I am not sure you have the whole story. Some of the leaders with whom I met today praised the way their absorption has been handled. Any new wave of immigrants feels discriminated against. The government has made supreme efforts and in the process, unfortunately, some mistakes too. But they are dear to our hearts. Their feelings are our feelings. They are brothers.

Q: What parts of this country belong to the Jews unequivocally?

A: Historically, all parts of the country belong to the Jewish people. But demographically, Jews do not live in all parts of the country. In practical terms, Gaza belongs to the people who reside there. Expelling them from their homes is not the Jewish way.

Q: How do you react to the hypocrisy of Yasser Arafat when he praises Yehiya Ayash, or when he talks of 'jihad"?

A: Should we judge him on his words or on his deeds? I have asked him about his use of the word "jihad." But we must look at the results. The PLO has stopped terror and it is actively fighting terror. The past can be praised because it cannot be changed.

Q: Do the Palestinians really want peace? I saw a map in Orient House on which the name Israel does not appear. In its place is the word Palestine.

A: There is a difference between asking and receiving. I can't ask them to stop dreaming. I am not saying that the Palestinians do not want more. But we have signed an agreement with them.

Q: Will there be a referendum on a Syrian peace treaty?

A: Yes.

Q: What final arrangements is Israel prepared to accept regarding Jerusalem?

A: Jerusalem is the united capital of Israel. We do not intend to divide it. It will be only the capital of Israel, politically closed, but religiously open.

Q: How will Israel deal with the possibility of a huge Jewish immigration from Russia if Zhirinovsky comes to power?

A: We are ready to receive all of them.

Q: What are your pragmatic hopes for the next four years?

A: We must proceed along a number of visionary approaches. The first is to strive to complete peace across the Middle East. Our hope is to have peaceful relations with the 21 or 22 Arab nations. To date we have relations with seven.

I see two convoys. A convoy full of dangers, and a convoy carrying hope. The dangers are the Islamic fundamentalists; the hopes are the peoples' hopes for peace. I hope that the convoy of hope will be first.

The second is to raise the standard of living across the Middle East. A higher standard of living for more people will diminish the level of violence.

The third is to build Israel as a country of science, technology and education, as a state, par excellence, which makes its living on its brains.

The fourth is to achieve the full development of the Negev. From Haifa to Ashdod, the coastal area is so densely populated. We must try to settle the south better.

The fifth is to set a new agenda for the next 100 years of Zionism. Next year marks the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Conference in Basel. The legend looks pale compared to the reality that has been achieved here. We, Israel, and the Jewish people have surpassed Herzl's dream.

I plan to call a conference next year bringing together all walks of Jewish life. I see an agenda covering the following matters:

- How to enable Israel to become an attraction to the Jews of the world and not only a haven for them.
- How to send forth a new Jewish message. Trust not only in the Lord but also in mankind. One of the reasons Israel is so much admired is because we have done the impossible.
- How Israel can become the spiritual centre of Jewish life.
- How our relationship with the Diaspora must be redefined; we must be partners in development not merely recipients.
- How we must plan to keep our children Jewish.

Q: Do you think Arafat was transformed by the Palestinian elections?

A: I prefer the problems of democracy rather than the perfections of other political systems. Palestinian democracy is important for Israel and for peace.

Q: Can you tell us about the informal talks being held behind the scenes about Jerusalem?

A: No one from the government side has taken part in any behind the scenes talks. There is not much substance to the headlines you are reading.

Campuses to join in Jewish Awareness Month

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At least three Canadian campuses are joining counterparts elsewhere in North America by holding a Jewish Awareness Month (JAM) from mid-February to mid-March.

The program, now in its second year, is a project of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, the international umbrella body for Jewish campus organizations which is based in Washington, D.C.

Toronto campuses in particular have had a much closer connection with Hillel since the arrival of Zac Kaye last year as director of Hillel-Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

Even the names of some of the Jewish student groups on campus reflect the change. At the University of Toronto, the Jewish Student Union (JSU) has been renamed Hillel-JSU; the Jewish Student Council (JSC) at Ryerson Polytechnic University is now known as Hillel at Ryerson; and the JSC at Seneca College has become Hillel at Seneca.

By running JAM, "what we're trying to do is provide programming of the sort we don't typically provide, [to] attract the uninvolved to socialize with other Jews, learn about Jewish culture and religion and be exposed to tzedakah or social action in a Jewish context," said Michael Sidlofsky, Toronto's JAM co-ordinator.

Sidlofsky is serving an "engagement" internship at U of T's Jewish Student Union. (Engagement is the Hillel term for outreach.)

Sidlofsky sees JAM as a way of increasing the number of students who are involved Jewishly, thereby promoting Jewish continuity.

The Toronto JAM program kicked off with a city-wide Shabbaton at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, followed by a havdalah and skating evening, aptly called Fire and Ice.

Other city-wide programs include a party on Feb. 24 at 9 p.m. to raise funds for Tay-Sachs research, a pre-Purim masquerade dance on March 2, a social action project for students of Zareinu (a Jewish school for mentally and physically challenged children), a volleyball tournament and an AIDS information evening with sex counsellor Sue Johanson.

Programs slated for York, U of T, Ryerson, Seneca

There will also be programs held at each of the York, U of T, Ryerson and Seneca campuses.

In Ottawa, JAM activities include Israel-related speakers and booths at the University of Ottawa on March 7 and Carleton University on March 9. Also on March 9, after mota'zei Shabbat, there will be a ski trip to a nearby resort, followed by a pub night.

A highlight of Ottawa's JAM will be a fashion show fundraiser on behalf of UJA, to be held March 23 and 24. Tickets will be available at a reduced rate for students.

In Vancouver, JAM activities will include challah- and hamantaschen-baking classes (Feb. 29 and March 12), a Purim costume party and a visual and performing arts benefit for the Canadian Cancer Society and Jewish Family Services agency.

For further information about JAM activities in Toronto, contact Michael Sidlofsky at 416-978-0422 or call 416-512-0814.

Temple celebrates 25 years

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Temple Har Zion, the first Reform synagogue in Thornhill, is celebrating its 25th anniversary this year with a number of special events.

The lively temple, with a membership of 550 families, is putting out a yearbook to observe the event. It will include an account of how its common parking lot with a neighboring Mosque came about.

The temple's innovations in social matters won a recent award for it at the biennial meeting in Atlanta of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC). Har Zion won the Irving J. Fain Award for its social action program, Breaking the Circle of Hate, which began as a one-day meeting for congregants of all ages to focus on combatting racism and neo-Nazism. The success of the day led to numerous spinoff activities, including interfaith youth workshops and intergenerational dialogues.

A number of events at the temple June 13 to 16 will include a dinner honoring Rabbi Michael S. Stroh on June 13, at which the guest speaker will be Rabbi Eric Yoffie, newly elected president of the UAHC.

For information on any of these events, call Temple Har Zion at 905-889-2252.

Professor says social issues must get onto Israel's agenda

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If and when the current Middle East peace process comes to some sort of final arrangement, there will be a number of social issues previously pushed aside, that Israel will have to deal with head-on says a professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

"The number 1 issue will be to redefine the relationship between religious and secular Israel," Prof. David Newman said at a recent lecture co-sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Newman said that in light of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, tensions between the religious and secular world in Israel have increased immensely.

"We should not delude ourselves that there is unity and that tension is minimal. The only time there is unity is when a foreign army is invading our country," he said.

Over the years, religious Zionism has moved politically from a central to a right of central position, he said.

"The centre means compromise and until 1977, the National Religious party was an important bridge between different factions. The costs involved in moving to the right are that social dialogue is lost. The cost is far greater than the party's gains from defining its stance. After the assassination, everyone said that there must be dialogue, but on their own terms. That is not dialogue — if ideological compromise is not accepted, then there is no dialogue.

"For us to recreate some sort of unity, meaningful dialogue needs to take place and to do that, there are several preconditions. The precondition for the secular left is that it must recognize that Israel, in some form, has Jewish identity. If that is negated, there will be no dialogue.

"On the other hand, the religious world must accept that in the framework of a civil society, rules are democratic and not halachic. Halachic arguments are meaningless to 75 percent of Israeli society and they cannot be used in a political debate. Without these preconditions, there will be no meaningful dialogue and the two sides will continue to grow apart rather than together," Newman said.

Each side feels ideologically threatened by the other side, he said, and he finds it "odd that two strong groups should feel threatened. Neither side is prepared to compromise and political leaders are using these fears to create a lobby for their particular points of view."

Newman said schools are paying the price of the polarized points of views. "Within the state system, there are general and religious schools ... and there are costs to pay for the separation. Secular Israel is remote from religious traditions and values, and due to the separation of schools, the general education system has turned away from any type of religion — even traditions."

Torah Fair draws over 900

By LEILA SPEISMAN

TORONTO — Over 900 children, parents and friends crammed the Spring Farm campus of Eitz Chaim Schools recently for this year's Torah Fair.

The fair, which is held every two years, is designed to supplement the school's religious curriculum.

Esther Weinstock, vice-principal in charge of the Spring Farm branch, said the projects, which are done either by individual students, small groups or classes, are "a representation or display in visual form of curriculum based topics," such as midrashim (stories that illustrate biblical or ethical themes), halachot, Jewish history, fast days or blessings.

One exhibit compared the waxing and waning of the moon to the history of the Jewish people, which alternated between tragedy and joy.

One series of exhibits showed the history of Jerusalem since the Akedah, the attempted sacrifice of Isaac.

A Jewish marriage is considered a step on the road to the rebuilding of the Temple and thus the restoration of the city to its former glory; so children combined pictures or figures of wedding scenes with visualizations of Jerusalem.

"It is a team effort of all the students and their teachers," Weinstock said. "They are all very involved and excited."

After the Torah Fair, the exhibits are displayed around the school, and many teachers use them to illustrate class topics.

This year, Weinstock said proudly, the art department of Baycrest Centre is taking six exhibits about dreams in the book of Genesis, and three about Jerusalem for permanent display at the Centre.

School projects such as the Torah Fair "encourage our students to learn and to develop as individuals," Weinstock said.

"Together with a strong academic program, [Eitz Chaim offers] alternate learning experiences. Learning is enriched and becomes multidimensional."

Participants set tone of mini-Moriah conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although keynote speakers Eugene Weiner and Shira Herzog set the tone at the recent mini-Moriah conference, Windows 5756: You Show Me Your Israel ... I'll Show You Mine!, it was the 70 participants representing a broad cross-section of the Jewish community who showed "exactly what these Moriah conferences are really all about," said Loretta Helman, the driving force behind the event.

The mini-Moriah was held recently at Baycrest Terrace, under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Forum, the organization established by Helman as the local affiliate of the Israeli Forum. The latter group, based in Tel Aviv, fosters ties between Israeli and Diaspora Jews through programs such as its Moriah conference, on which the mini-Moriah was based.

At the one-day Toronto program, three workshops, of which participants could attend two, provided a forum for exchange of ideas and brought together diverse segments of the community.

One workshop, entitled Roots and Routes, focused on young Canadians and Israelis. The participants, Israeli- and Canadian-born, discussed the importance of the Israel experience to Diaspora youth and the varied sources from which Diaspora youth and Israeli Jews derive their identity.

"For some of [the participants], they saw there was an entry point to work together. I was very pleased," said Zac Kaye, director of Hillel Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, who co-led the session with Rina Cohen, an Israeli-born York University professor.

The two other workshops were Flanken, Falafel, Fajitas (changing ideologies and perceptions of Israel over the decades), led by Baruch Gur, Jewish Agency shaliach, and Allan Reitzes, executive director, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto; and Almighty Shekel (With Israel's economy booming, what forces will hold us together?), with economists Eliakim Katz and Jack Mintz.

"At the end of the day, we're bound together despite our differences," said Herzog, Israeli-born vice-president of the Kahanoff Foundation, a private Canadian foundation that works in Canada and Israel, and its related investment companies.

Herzog first came to Canada over two decades ago when her father Yakov was the Israeli ambassador to Canada.

Mutual understanding of Israeli and Diaspora Jews is limited, Herzog indicated, partly by the dearth of opportunities for Israelis to associate with their Diaspora counterparts.

Weiner's background and relationship to Israel differ markedly from Herzog's. An American-born sociologist and ordained rabbi, who served three years at Hamilton's Beth Jacob Congregation, he made aliyah in the late 1960s and is a faculty member at Haifa University.

While in Hamilton, he organized and led two educational contingents of young people on summer trips to Israel in an idealistic realization of his recognition that Israel was "the ultimate resource. I saw the electricity of the impact of Israel on young people."

JEWISH NATIONAL FUND OF CANADA

Announcing the establishment of the Yitzhak Rabin Forest
in the Jerusalem Corridor

The Jewish National Fund has traditionally dedicated a park or forest in memory of former Prime Ministers of Israel. The area of the Jerusalem Corridor is closely associated with Yitzhak Rabin. During Israel's War of Independence, he commanded a brave Palmach Brigade in that area and always felt a close attachment.

Therefore, the Jewish National Fund will replant, rename and rededicate the Jerusalem Corridor area as the Yitzhak Rabin Forest in memory and in honour of Israel's slain Prime Minister.

Some dream about changing the world. Yitzhak Rabin tried to turn dreams into reality — to end decades of blood and tears. You now have the opportunity to honour the memory and the vision of Yitzhak Rabin by participating in the development of the Yitzhak Rabin Forest.

The political oxymoron

Michel Gauthier is the new leader of the Bloc Québécois. True to the script he inherited from his predecessor, immediately after his election last week as party leader, he chose to insult the prime minister in reference to the latter's scuffle in Hull with a bothersome separatist heckler.

But Gauthier's brimstone is less pungent and his fire casts far less heat than that of Bouchard. Now that the spotlight of the separatists' drama falls on their main star in Quebec City, Gauthier will be hard pressed to hold the stage in Ottawa. His speeches and questions in the Commons will be overshadowed constantly by Premier Bouchard's soliloquies to the cameras downstream on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

In addition to the lesser spotlight, Gauthier will also suffer a serious gap in credibility. His inaugural statement as party leader amply demonstrates this.

As reported in the media, upon his election, Gauthier spoke in English twice "to assure [Canadians] the Bloc will, at times, still speak on their behalf. The Bloc will continue to be a real official opposition, ready to fight for equity and social justice, coast to coast in Canada."

Canadians know better than to be persuaded by such empty rhetoric. The Bloc has a single purpose and a single interest: the dismantling of Canada. It has no interest whatsoever in fighting any battles for Canadians "coast to coast", save the battle that would forever destroy for Canadians the country we cherish and love from coast to coast.

In a pitch to Quebecers for their votes in the upcoming by-elections, the new leader said that "the Bloc remains for them all the only true representatives on the federal scene."

In these remarks, Gauthier was more revealing, even if unintentionally. There is nothing federalist about the Bloc. The former Bloc leader and current premier of Quebec has said he will never sit at a constitutional table to discuss renewed federalism. The Bloc is the antithesis of federalism.

When used in the same sentence, the terms "the Bloc" and "the federal scene" are a political oxymoron. Canadians will not be fooled.

By his company

Nittai of Arbel, one of our wise mishnaic sages, said it best. "Keep far away from a bad neighbor and do not consort with a wicked person." He understood that associating with the wicked leads one ultimately to adopt wicked ways.

Louis Farrakhan, on the other hand, doesn't seem to care much about the company he keeps. He has just completed the third leg of a bizarre, middle eastern tour. He stopped in Iraq long enough to call a press conference and to gibe at the Jews. This was after he visited Iran, where he was reported to have said, "God will destroy America by the hands of Muslims," and after he visited Libya, where he reportedly secured a $1-billion investment from his colleague Muammar Khaddafi.

The American Congress will undoubtedly be interested in inquiring into the details of Farrakhan's deal with the man who has staunchly refused to hand over the suspects from the Lockerbie air massacre. It may even ask him to explain his Teheran comments. Americans tend not to look kindly on anyone who calls for their society's destruction.

Farrakhan, one of America's boldest anti-Semites, seems to have become even bolder, invigorated, if that is possible, by his whirlwind tour of the middle east tyrants, dictators, despots and oppressors, the kingpins of the sordid, craven world of terrorists and murderers.

All decent people will know him by the company he keeps.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Feb. 20, 1807, Ezekiel Hart, elected member for the riding of Three Rivers in the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada, was refused the right to take his seat because he refused to be sworn in "on the true faith of a Christian." (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Yasser Arafat and the bomb maker

Re: Letter by Bert Raphael "Adulation of Yehya Ayyash frightening" (Feb. 3)

The PLO's Yasser Arafat did not merely fail to "condemn the atrocious deeds of the bomb maker" (Ayyash). Arafat has, for at least a year now, been inciting to war and more suicide bombings while praising those "martyrs" who already died; all of which is openly broadcast on "Palestinian" TV.

Are we all really that ignorant of the facts or are we once again practising wilful blindness?

Girls on Jewish school teams

The article entitled "Jewish Schools Prepare for Hockey Tourney" (CJN, Feb. 8) states that four Jewish day schools have added boys hockey to their extra curriculum activities. In fact, the hockey teams are co-ed and there is at least one girl on each of the four day school teams.

Martin Lockshin and Peace Now

Subsequent to Prof. Martin Lockshin's article (CJN, Jan. 18), in which he rightfully criticized certain elements in right-wing Orthodoxy for not condemning extremist rhetoric or violence in their ranks, your paper carried two letters, one by Leonard Warner, the other by Joseph Winter.

Rather than trying to counter Lockshin's arguments, they both sought to muddy the waters by accusing him of supporting Peace Now. One of your correspondents wrote that Lockshin is an active member of the above organization. As a board member of Peace Now, I categorically state that this is a falsehood.

'Put our own house in order'

The fact that a small portion of the Jewish community was outraged enough to send letters to The CJN criticising Prof. Martin Lockshin's balanced and cogent analysis of the divisions in the Jewish community caused by the fanaticism of some of the West Bank settlers proves Lockshin's point. Put succinctly, the problem is to put our own house in order — the problem for our Jewish community is not in Hebron but in Hebronto.

Lazarus sparked historic debate

Shira Herzog (CJN, Jan. 25) states that Yacov Herzog, Israel's ambassador to Canada in 1961, was called by a journalist asking for a reaction to remarks made by British historian Arnold Toynbee at a lecture at McGill University.

For the record, the journalist who was the catalyst for the historic debate between Herzog and Toynbee and the subsequent events was the late Charles Lazarus of the Montreal Star.

Newcomer shocked by lack of Kashrut

I have recently moved to Toronto from Philadelphia, where a ruling exists stating that any Jewish event, if sponsored by an organization that reaches out to the community at large, must respect dietary laws. This serves to unify all segments of the Jewish community.

Several weeks ago in Toronto, I attended an event and only discovered, after I had partaken of the meal, that in fact it was not kosher. It hadn't even occured to me to ask, as certainly this was a given that I took for granted. I learned, rather shockingly, that the Philadelphia paradigm does not apply in Toronto. In fact, Jewish organizations who do not fall under the umbrella of your Jewish federation, are free to decide for themselves whether or not kashrut should be observed. The issue, as I see it, is not about my personal level of observance, but rather about how a community might benefit by being sensitive to and thereby serving the needs of all of its members.

Yiddish folksongs present snapshot of Jewish life

By NAOMI BELL

A picture is worth a thousand words and Yiddish folksongs are like pictures — tiny snapshots of Jewish life. Every aspect of society is reflected: work and struggle, love and marriage, family life and customs, communal values and personal feelings.

For East European Jews in the 19th century, Yiddish folksongs provided a remarkable emotional outlet and mirrored every aspect of their lives. For women especially, they provided a means of self-expression and the texts of countless lullabies and love songs retell the stories of their lives.

From the lullabies a mother crooned to her babies, we learn much about the expectations of society. To her son, mother would extol the value of Torah learning and in song after song, she urged him to become a pious scholar. But what message did she give to her daughter?

Sleep, my pretty little girl.
When you'll be 12 years old I'll marry you off to a fine young man.
Your father, that heretic (apikoires) says you shouldn't marry
Till you're 18 years old! Did you ever hear anything so ridiculous?

The theme of Rozhinkes Mit Mandeln (Raisins and Almonds), appears in several lullabies for boys. The little white goat will bring the baby gifts if he will study Torah, because knowledge of "Toireh is the best schroireh (merchandise)." There are variants of this theme directed at girls, but with a subtle difference in the message:

Under Soreleh's cradle stands a clear white goat.
The goat will go to market to buy raisins and almonds.
What is the best merchandise (schroireh)?
Sorele's chosn (bridegroom) will study Torah. (but not Soreleh herself!)

From earliest childhood, a girl was taught that to marry a scholar should be her highest aspiration. There is a large group of riddle songs in which the daughter is asked "Whom do you want to marry?" After several verses of rejecting humble artisans (tailors and cobblers), she finally chooses a lamdan (a scholar) as her husband, obviously with mother's approval.

If the ideal husband was a Torah scholar, what did a girl have to learn to make her a good wife?

To pray and write and read Yiddish,
To sew and embroider headbands,
One must learn when one is young, so as not to aggravate the parents,
So that the matchmakers may flock to see her.

In the traditional hierarchal society of the shtetl parents arranged matches for their children, often without consulting them. Many songs reflect the feelings of the young woman forced into a loveless marriage.

O, we poor girls, what good is our dowry if we're forced to marry fools?
Our parents arrange marriages without consulting us,
And they make our lives miserable.

This scene from Fiddler on the Roof portrays one of Yiddish literature's classic depictions of the loving but "colorful" relationship between husband and wife in poor, Eastern European shtetl life. [Photo by Betty Lee Hunt Associates extracted from The Jewish Calendar, Seigel and Strassfield]

Even worse than an unhappy marriage was not to be married at all, because a spinster lacked status in shtetl society:

Oy oy oy, it's bitter as death to be old maid (alteh moid)

In the latter half of the 19th century, young men and women from poor families flocked to the cities to work in the primitive factories and sweatshops. They hoped not only to improve their economic conditions, but also to be able to find romance without parental supervision and veto. But if young women had dreamed of a better life, they were doomed to disappointment.

Exploited by ruthless employers, seduced and abandoned by young men intoxicated with their new freedom, the seamstresses gave vent to their feelings in song after song. With remarkable eloquence they poured out their longing and frustration: the hardship of working at the machine for endless hours, their yearning for romance and longing for deliverance from their hard lot. The following examples can merely hint at the range of these songs:

Huddled over the machine I sit, mother, I, your only child.
Every bone in my body aches, and the work is making me blind.

Or this one:

Before I lie down it's already time to get up and drag my sick and aching bones to work. If I come a minute late they dock me half a day's pay, and it's such a long way! Needles break at the rate of 15 a minute, and my fingers stream blood. I'm constantly hungry, and I don't have money to buy food. But if I ask the boss for my pay he says to forget it. I cry out to God with a great cry: Why was I born to be a seamstress?

Marriage was the seamstresses' only hope for deliverance, but the recently liberated young men were not eager to make a commitment to only one woman. After the restrictive rules of the shtetl, they revelled in their new-found freedom and flitted from one woman to another. Naturally, there are many songs of spinsters pleading for marriage and of abandoned women giving vent to their grief. One woman says,

I no longer have strength to toil in the factory.
I plead with you to marry me, and release me from this burden.

and the man replies:
I cannot do so now because I have an older sister. After she finds a husband,
With the help of the Almighty, I promise to become your husband.

(In subsequent verses it becomes obvious that he doesn't really mean it!)

In a well-known folksong the woman declares:

Ich bin shoin a meidl in de yor'n (I'm getting on in years!)
Why have you kept me dangling for so long?
I would have married long ago if you hadn't kept me waiting for so long.

She promises that her mother will sell the house to raise a dowry, and ends with a threat:

Just in case you have another woman who is prettier and better than I,
I wish her just four years of love and then a fate like mine!

Many songs tell of seduction and abandonment:

Listen to my story, dear mother.
Once I had a precious vineyard which I should have kept locked.
Without asking my permission, he came into my vineyard,
And stole the most precious fruit from the tree.

Not all lovesongs are sad. Many are flirtatious and lively, with a mischievous sense of fun, and reflect the new, free spirit of boy-girl relationships in the cities.

Oy, Avrom, I can't live without you!
Do you remember how you used to whisper secrets to me at the gate?
Do you remember my pretty red dress, and what a sweet girl I was?

Or, with a slight hint of desperation underlying the lilting melody:

I've told you again and again that I have no dowry and no yichus (status).
If wealth is what you want, go elsewhere.
But if you want a real mentsh, then you've come to the right place.

The mass migration to America in the late 19th and early 20th centuries brought forth a large body of songs of parting: wives and sweethearts saying goodby to their men, and mothers parting with their sons.

You are leaving me, my dearest one.
How can I live without you?
Don't forget to write to me. O, I am dying, I am perishing of grief!

The fear that her man would find another woman in the new world is expressed in many songs:

My heart weeps within me as we say goodbye. Parting is so painful!
Be sure to write to me from the first town and if you meet another woman, please, please don't forget me!

Once arrived in America, women as well as men discovered that there was no "golden land" awaiting them, and that it required back-breaking toil in miserable conditions to eke out a meagre living. A popular theatre song tells the story of di grine kuzine, a pretty, fresh-faced young immigrant who came to America full of hope and optimism, but quickly became worn out and embittered by her hard life.

Most labor and protest songs don't address themselves specifically to women. Rather, they speak of oppressed workers toiling in the sweatshops. But in the late 19th century, the labor poet David Edleshtat wrote a stirring song directed specifically to women:

Working women, suffering women, you who languish at home and in the factory,
Why don't you help to build a temple of freedom, of human happiness? ...
Through the bitterest storms, women have shown that they can be trusted ... with the ho. banner of freedom, equality and ideals!

In this brief survey of Yiddish folksong an essential is, of course, missing — the music! Many of these songs are set to beautiful melodies that are a joy to hear and a pleasure to sing. Ideally a Yiddish folksong should be studied for its text and enjoyed for its music. But the texts themselves can convey a world of information and feeling about individual lives and about changing cultural values and traditions.

Reading the texts of these simple songs is like listening to the voices of the people themselves, as they poured out their intimate feelings and thoughts. Yiddish folksong is, indeed, a "mirror of Jewish life."

Ski trip helps unite Jewish students

One chairlift. Seven runs open. And 30 Jewish students from universities in Halifax, Saint John, Fredericton and Wolfville ready to hit the slopes meant one thing: Crabbe Mountain in Fredericton, N.B. was about to be surprised.

By Viva Press

Since when is skiing Jewish? Since we took over the hill.

In freezing temperatures of minus 25 C, we layered up and set out for the slopes. We made up more than half of the skiers on the hill.

The ski weekend is one of many events APJSF organizes for Jewish university students. Other programs the APJSF has hosted this year include bi-monthly Shabbat dinners, holiday celebrations on Sukkot and Tu b'Shvat (Purim still to come) and two other weekend retreats, the Back to our Roots retreat in Wolfville, N.S., and a summer camping trip to Musquodoboit, N.S.

The APJSF is responsible for reaching Jewish students throughout the Maritimes. At Ontario universities, the Jewish students federation serve mainly as organizers for Jewish events, whereas the APJSF has an even more significant mandate: It is a "centralizing" body for Jewish students who are in very small minorities at the dozen or so universities in the Atlantic provinces.

Of course, Jews are in the minority in Ontario too, but there is an appreciably larger Jewish network already established. Jewish youth organizations are already in place and Jewish students have often known one another since high school.

In contrast in the Maritimes, the APJSF, the only Jewish organization, plays a crucial role in keeping Jewish students in touch with one another, in making sure that communication takes place.

The retreats it organizes enable students from different universities to get together for a weekend where they can discuss Jewish issues. For the six or seven Jewish university students in Wolfville, it is nice to know that there are other Jewish students out here with whom they can affiliate.

The APJSF has done more than just programming for us; it has helped us meet new friends with whom we can share our Jewishness. The bi-monthly Shabbat dinners that the APJSF hosts in Halifax do not mean that on the intervening Fridays we forget about Shabbat. Rather, now that we have made a group of friends, it is with these friends that we celebrate Shabbat and other Jewish holidays.

Recently a pot-luck vegetarian Shabbat dinner was held at my apartment. The Shabbat candles were waiting to be lit. The challah looked perfect on my new challah board and the table was set for eight. All that was missing were the guests. And then they came. Jewish time, of course — everyone was late!

In attendance were Dalhousie students Erin Sperling, Jasmine Oore, Jane Shkolnik; King's students Ian Epstein, Ros Allen, my two roommates Leslie and Jenn (previously introduced in my Sukkot article) and me. After kiddush and the Hamotzi we dug into our meal.

If it wasn't for the APJSF, we might have never met one another. Yet, here we were sharing a Shabbat meal. The main topic of our Shabbat discussion was, of course, our most recent event together, the ski trip. We relived the events of the whole weekend.

It was a great feeling to be able to share that Shabbat meal with other students in my situation. Jewish students without the backup of a larger community have to work hard to sustain their connection with Judaism.

At the ski weekend retreat, Acadia University student Shayna Allen, who is doing a research project on how religion affects one's leisure activities, asked us to fill out a survey. One of the items on the survey posed the question: "Does religion interrupt your leisure time?"

No, I answered. I actively choose to participate in Jewish traditions. I do not view these holidays and celebrations as interruptions. My leisure time revolves around my school work and my Jewish commitments. One cannot single out my Jewishness as an interruption. It is instead an integral part of being a student in Halifax.

And I'm not the only one who feels how important it is to maintain contact with my Jewish counterparts scattered around the Maritimes. The pot-luck was not the first Shabbat dinner I have shared with my Jewish friends, nor will it be the last.

Community's future found on campuses

More years ago than I care to remember, I used to write a regular column in our local Jewish newspaper in Manchester, England. As a national Jewish student leader I also had a column in our Jewish student newspaper.

By Zac Kaye

Essentially I wrote articles about what today would be called Jewish continuity issues, as well as articles on the dream of the time, a non-existent peace process. Most of my friends and colleagues thought me too pessimistic about the former and too optimistic on the latter.

At this time, I do not have much to say about the peace process, other than I am sure that many of my old friends will be scratching their balding patches, wondering how things I used to write about — and drive them mad with — have now come true.

Reading press clippings this week about a new demographic study on British Jewry that describes the depressing rise in the intermarriage rate, the decline in synagogue affiliation and other indices of affiliation has confirmed my long held view about my native country. The cup is certainly not half full, when one of the great communities of the Diaspora is in serious trouble, and I am not sure it has the tools to rectify the situation.

I grew up in a working-class Jewish area of Manchester called Hightown, adjacent to Cheetham Hill, an area rich in Jewish traditions and people, where the synagogues, the shops and the chedarim were found. Zionism and Judaism were a constant part of our lives growing up in this ghetto.

We felt a unique pride in growing up as Jews in an area that, despite being heavily Jewish, was still anti-Semitic. Anti-Jewish riots had broken out before the war, when Mosley's blackshirts had attempted to march, and even more so after the war during the dying days of the mandate in Palestine and later when the state of Israel was declared.

Against this background, I decided to become an educator and more importantly, a Jewish community professional, with a passion that becomes stretched and perhaps even weaker as each day goes by.

The acculturation and assimilation that have wreaked havoc with the western Diaspora have destroyed our collective memory and have given rise to an age of kiruv (religious outreach). Judaism has now to be brought to the people; it is not a part of the natural environment.

My role models gave me true Jewish values, believing in community and building on the cherished values of the kehillah. There was no fancy advertising.

We live today in a disconnected age. Nowhere is this more evident than on the campus, my chosen area of professional endeavor for the last 15 years.

The future of the community is to be found on our campuses, but the Jewish experiences of many of our Jewish students are limited by the few professional role models available to interrelate with them, and by the limited funds which inhibit the quality of programs offered. The staff at the Hillel-Jewish Campus Services in Toronto struggle heroically against tremendous odds to build a Jewish atmosphere on our campuses.

It would seem to me and many others I have talked to that the Jews of Toronto do not take the campus experience seriously, that it is not a significant part of their lives. It is, however, time that a sense of sharing in the future of the community emerged, that says if Jewish continuity is important, then nowhere is it more important to engage young Jews in some kind of Jewish experience than on the campus.

The memories of many growing up in Toronto and Montreal and reading this article are probably similar to mine. Different times call for different remedies. As we develop a Jewish Campus Service here that mirrors the tremendous strides being made by Hillel in the United States, we need the support of parents and the community at large to make it happen.

The '50s are no more. Nowhere is this more true than on the "Jewish wastelands of the campus," as Irving Abella referred to many of our universities.

If you are interested in taking up the challenge, give me a call at 416-512-0814.

We can still create the dream of kehillah. We just have to work harder at it.

Arguing before Supreme Court

Ontario is a province in which the government supplies Catholic day school education out of tax funds, while all non-Catholic denominations are denied that privilege and have to fund their own schools. Quebec, on the other hand, treats all denominations equally in this respect, despite its overwhelming Catholic majority.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Why does Ontario abide by a policy which, to all effects and purposes, is discriminatory and grossly unfair to half the population? It should be pointed out that this is not the invention of the Harris government but is the inheritance of previous regimes, from NDP to Liberal to earlier Conservative administrations.

Perhaps there was a time when matters might have been different, but the Jewish community itself was divided on the matter. There were many who believed that funding for day schools meant criticism of the public school system and, therefore, would not support an all-out effort to persuade the government to act even-handedly. Since then, political efforts having led nowhere, the leadership of the community — now united in its efforts to establish that equality — has taken recourse to the judicial system. But so far, the legal challenge too has failed and the lower courts have turned down the constitutional challenge. Now the matter is before the Supreme Court of Canada and in late January, the case was argued before the justices.

The Jewish schools do not want full funding. They only want it for that portion of the curriculum which teaches the subjects taught in the public schools.

A survey of public opinion has regularly established the fact that the majority of Ontarians think that funding for independent schools is fair.

Such funding would not erode the public school system. In Quebec, the government covers 80 percent of the independent school operating cost and the public education system has suffered no damage. Nor is this the case in some 60 countries where public funding is the rule.

It is often claimed that, dollar for dollar, private schools are more expensive, when in fact they are one-third less expensive than the public system. The reason is simple: the salaries for teachers are less and a smaller range of programs is available to independent school students.

The Jewish brief does not advocate the abrogation of the Roman Catholic privilege, because it supports the concept of pluralism and multiculturalism. It does however believe that viable school systems of other faith communities are deserving of equal funding.

The bottom line is that most Jews believe that parents should have a choice to send their children either to the public school system or wherever they wish. I hope that the Supreme Court will feel that fairness must have its say and must remain the over-riding principle of any constitutional argument.

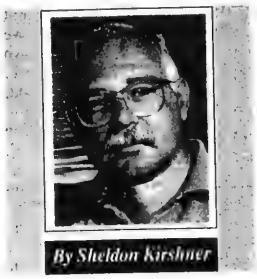
Child of Holocaust survivors designs Berlin museum



On a site close to what had been the headquarters of the Gestapo during the Third Reich, Berlin's Jewish Museum is rising phoenix-like. The exterior of the $80-million (US) building is virtually completed and all that remains to be finished are the interiors.

Scheduled to be opened in May 1997, the museum — an extension of the Berlin Museum — was designed by a child of Polish Holocaust survivors.

Daniel Libeskind, an architect with an international reputation, beat 170 competitors in a 1988 design contest to win the commission.

Constructed of steel and concrete, and clad in zinc, the museum is crowned by a distorted Star of David and linked by a series of tunnels symbolizing the emigration under duress of Berlin Jews, the Holocaust and the formation of the state of Israel and a new Jewish community in post-war Berlin.

In Toronto recently to deliver a lecture on memory and the Holocaust, Libeskind told me that the overriding purpose of the museum is to bring together the elements of Jewish and German history in the city under one roof.

Before the accession to power of the Nazis, Berlin was home to about 200,000 Jews, the most prominent of whom included Albert Einstein, Walter Benjamin, Max Reinhardt and Arnold Schoenberg.

Today, five decades after the collapse of the Nazi regime, Berlin's Jewish population has grown to approximately 10,000.

Libeskind, 49, acknowledged that the museum project has not been an easy one in political, cultural or spiritual terms.

Some Germans, he said in an interview at the Design Exchange, believe that closure should be imposed on the Nazi era. Still others believe that the museum should be smaller and more discreet. Not surprisingly, then, Libeskind has received hate mail and abusive telephone calls. And an early pamphlet about the museum, which was sabotaged by a printer, referred to him in the past tense, as if he had died.

Such incidents, of course, have upset Libeskind, who has an architectural practice in Berlin and Los Angeles. But they haven't deterred him.

Libeskind, who was born in Lodz, is working on two additional commissions in Germany — a massive housing project around Sachsenhausen, the site of a former concentration camp, and on an art museum in Osnabruk dedicated to Felix Nussbaum, the painter who perished in Auschwitz.

Given these assignments, Libeskind spends the bulk of his time in Berlin, in a neighborhood where Christopher Isherwood wrote his Berlin Stories. Libeskind's spouse and helpmate, Nina, is the daughter of the late leader of the federal New Democratic Party, David Lewis. They have three children.

Libeskind, who is also a tenured professor at the University of California, made his first trip to Germany in 1983 for an exhibition. He had previously avoided Germany. The visit so angered some of his relatives that they broke off all relations with him, and ostracize him to this day.

Libeskind is greatly concerned by the physical deterioration of former concentration camps-cum-museums like Sachsenhausen and Ravensbruck. Their operating budgets have been slashed and they are literally falling apart, he said.

"They are in danger of truly disappearing," he warned.

In his view, scarce public funds should be spent on preserving such sites rather than erecting huge Holocaust monuments.

Libeskind, for example, is dubious about the memorial that the central government planned to build near the Brandenburg Gate in Berlin. He has several objections. The site has no historic connection with the Jewish past and is thus "completely artificial." It is physically too big, while the idea of inscribing some five million names on it is "absurd."

The Central Council of Jews in Germany, as well as the German government, broadly concur with Libekind's critique. The project has been put on hold, pending further decisions.

A sad and bizarre tale

Stella Goldschlag, a German Jew, was a greifer, or a catcher. She hunted down Jews for the Gestapo in wartime Berlin.

By all accounts, she was responsible for the deaths of at least several dozen Jews. She was the ultimate traitor, but given the circumstances, she was also a deeply tragic figure.

Her pre-war classmate, Peter Wyden, has written a searching account about Goldschlag, who was brought to trial after Nazi Germany's defeat and found guilty of aiding and abetting multiple murders.

Wyden's book, Stella (Doubleday, $12), is hobbled by annoying digressions. Better organization and tighter editing would have helped. These faults notwithstanding, Stella is fairly absorbing.

And why shouldn't it be? The story of a Jewish woman "turned" by the Nazis to betray her own people is unusual.

As Wyden remembers her, Goldschlag was tall, slim and leggy, with light blue eyes, pale satin skin and glowing blond hair. She was stereotypically Germanic and, he adds, she detested being Jewish.

Did she imbibe this self-hatred from her assimilated parents? Wyden doesn't offer the slightest clue. What he does tell us is that they were reluctant to leave Germany, even in the face of increasing official anti-Semitism.

The Jews who remained in Berlin after 1940 were not only dogged by cruel restrictions, but could be rounded up at any time and be deported to concentration camps. Goldschlag was acutely aware of the danger, and in order to save herself and her parents, she agreed to work for the Gestapo. Wyden claims that 20 young Jewish men and women were part of her network, known as the Jewish Scouting Service.

Catchers, he writes, were decently fed and paid. They did not have to wear a Jewish star. And they carried special identification papers. Goldsclag was an asset to the Nazis, having an excellent memory for names, dates and addresses.

She frequently appeared at funerals for Christian spouses in mixed marriages. When such gentiles died, their Jewish partners automatically lost their immunity from deportation. Goldschlag arrested them at the cemetery or nabbed them on the way home. She was ruthless.

Her treachery, though, did not save her parents from the fate suffered by so many Jews. They were shipped to Theresienstadt, thence to Auschwitz.

After the war, as a resident of East Germany, she claimed she had been a "victim of fascism." Her alibi didn't hold. She was arrested and, after a summary trial, was sentenced to serve 10 years at hard labor in a series of camps, including Sachsenhausen. Freed after several years, she was rearrested, then finally released.

After settling down, Goldschlag converted to Christianity and became, in Wyden's words, "outspokenly anti-Semitic." Her third husband, he claims, was a Nazi.

Goldschlag did not get along well with her sole child, Yvonne, who had been raised by a guardian. A public health nurse, Yvonne immigrated to Israel before the Six Day War. She has no contact with her mother, having severed her ties long ago.

Building blocks

By RABBI STEVEN GARTEN

Building things, reading blueprints, fixing leaky faucets are not highlighted in my resume. In fact, I confess to being the only graduate of my high school with four post-BA degrees to have flunked industrial arts (shop), not once, but twice.

You can understand my consternation, then, upon being asked to reflect on this week's Torah portion which begins, "build me a sanctuary."

You can also imagine my utter delight when I chanced upon these words by the biblical commentator Abravanel: "Does not every detail of the Tabernacle and its furnishings have symbolic meaning? It is difficult to imagine that the two cherubim in the form of babes crowning the ark or the seven-branched candlestick with its elaborate carvings of almonds, cups and flowers have no symbolic significance." I did not have to deal with construction, only allegory.

Modern scholars have taught us to appreciate correspondences between similar phraseology and key words recurring in different places in sacred text. The number seven has a special significance in the Torah. In six days God created the heavens and earth. On the seventh, God gave us Shabbat. According to the Torah, while humankind is to make the tabernacle, God made its design in six days and on the seventh day, God called to Moses and showed him the design.

In the creation story, the Hebrew verb asah (to make) appears seven times. The same verb reoccurs almost 200 times in the story of the tabernacle. If these examples did not convince us of a relationship between God's creation and the building of the tabernacle, there is one more. When the creation was finished, the Torah tells us that, "God blessed the seventh day." When the work that begins in our portion is completed 25 chapters later, the text reads: "Moses blessed them."

God creates a world for humankind to dwell in. The parallel would appear to be that people create a tabernacle to provide a place on earth for the divine presence. Yet that seemed too simplistic for our rabbinic commentators. Could we really build a structure that would be a home for God? Could God really be limited by bricks and mortar? A literal reading of the text might confirm that interpretation.

However, the Malbim reads our portion somewhat differently: "God creates a world for humankind to dwell in and care for. Each human is required to create a tabernacle for God in his or her own heart."

We build a temple to God within our hearts when we open our hearts to the needs of others. In the parlance of psychology that is called empathy. In the language of Judaism it is called tzedakah and gemilut chasadim. Tzedakah is giving of money to individuals or institutions, gemilut chasadim is giving of our time, skills, energies. Together these two mitzvot form the foundation of God's tabernacle.

There is an ancient Jewish saying which states, "Give a man a fish, he eats for a day; teach a man to fish and he eats for a lifetime." That's the difference between tzedakah and gemilut chasadim.

We can and must donate to the Jewish federations, United Way, Red Cross or any number of hospitals or charities. Yet we must also look for ways to teach a man to fish, with literacy programs, Jewish Big Brothers, even coaching children for the Special Olympics.

I am told that a building requires a level foundation. It we are to build a tabernacle for God in our hearts that complements God's creation, we must build it upon a foundation of tzedakah and gemilut chasadim.

Levinas a leading philosopher

By LAWRENCE KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

On Dec. 25, 1995, Emmanuel Levinas, one of this century's pre-eminent philosophers and Jewish thinkers, died in Paris at the age of 90.

Guest Voices

Born in Kovno, Lithuania, into an Orthodox family steeped in both Jewish and Russian culture, Levinas grew up studying at one and the same time the Bible and other classic Jewish texts, and Tolstoy and Dostoevsky.

He went to France in 1923 to pursue a degree in philosophy, and in 1928 and '29 studied at the University of Freiburg under Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger, the two greatest philosophers of the day, whose writings he later introduced to a French audience.

Levinas' major philosophic work, Totality and Infinity (1961), established his reputation as one of Europe's leading philosophers, a reputation consolidated by many other works which followed in swift succession. By the last quarter century, Levinas, together with Jacques Derrida and Michel Foucalt, were widely viewed as France's intellectual superstars.

Paralleling his "Greek" philosophic works, were his important "Hebrew" writings. For many years, Levinas delivered a talmudic lecture at an annual conference of French intellectuals, an event which soon became a highlight of French Jewish intellectual life. Many of these lectures, collected in three volumes, have been translated into English as Nine Talmudic Readings. Several more of these lectures appeared, together with other essays of Levinas on Jewish thought, in the important anthology Difficle Liberté. (The English version of this work, Difficult Liberty, is unfortunately extremely poor.)

Jews and the afterlife

Jewish Views Of The Afterlife by Simcha Paull Raphael Jason-Aaronson

The author of this informative volume relates the following incident. A rabbi lecturing to a group of nurses was asked, "Does Judaism believe in an afterlife?" He replied, "Judaism celebrates life and the living. It dwells on life here rather than on the hereafter as other faiths do. Life is precious, the here and the now."

This customary response disturbs Raphael. He asserts, "It is simply not true." Jewish Views of the Afterlife demonstrates his contention that Jews have always believed in the "next world" and that there exists an extensive legacy of Jewish writings and teachings on the subject.

The author skillfully guides the reader through beliefs and views on the afterlife that are found in the Bible, rabbinic literature, Kabbalah, and Chassidism. Especially noteworthy is his presentation of little-known texts from medieval Midrash, some of which were discovered in the 19th century in the famous Cairo Geniza. Some of this material is as lurid and grotesque as anything found in Dante's Inferno.

The Torah contains very few references to the afterlife, other than to a shadowy realm of disembodied spirits called Sheol. Unique is the sentiment in the Book of Daniel: "And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame."

In the centuries following the Babylonian Exile (586 to 536 BCE), Persian and Greek influences stimulated Jewish thinking in new directions. Apocryphal literature written during the period (200 BCE to 200 CE) contained elaborate descriptions of Gehenna and Paradise, as well as the doctrines of individual immortality, divine judgement and the resurrection of the dead.

Rabbinic teachings about the afterlife are numerous, but they are ambiguous and contradictory. The Ethics of the Fathers, a portion of the Mishnah, teaches that this world is like a vestibule before the world to come: "Prepare yourself in the vestibule so that you may enter into the hall of a palace." Yet there is the opposing teaching from the same text: "Better is one hour of repentance and good deeds in this world than a whole life of the world to come."

The sage Rav (third century CE) conjured up this vision of the hereafter: "There is no eating, nor drinking, nor propagation, nor business, nor jealousy, nor hatred, nor competition, but the righteous sit with crowns on their heads feasting on the brightness of the Shechinah." Yet this sage who presents so spiritual a view also teaches that in the world to come a person will be obliged to give an account of every legitimate pleasure he denied himself in this world.

Understandably, medieval Jewish philosophers held diverse opinions on this complex subject. The author lucidly summarizes the views of Saadia Gaon, Maimonides, Gersonides and Nachmanides.

Chapters on the Kabbalah and chassidic tales offer provocative insights into such concepts as the levels of the soul, reincarnation and an understanding of illness and the dying process.

What will surprise most readers is the author's contention that the actions of the living can influence the dead, that between the living and world of the dead there is a window and not a wall. "Jewish tradition suggests that the living can functionally influence the fate of the soul in the realms of the afterlife. Perhaps through the processes of burial, shivah, Kaddish, yahrzeit and Yizkor bereaved friends and family, and appropriate 'soul guiding' professionals, can consciously attune to the inner worlds and help the disembodied soul to progress through the various phases of the postmortem journey."

The author, a bereavement psychologist, influenced by recent developments in trans-personal psychology and consciousness research, insists that we need to reach rabbis, educators, helping professionals and others about Judaism's afterlife teachings as well as recent psychological perspectives on dying and bereavement.

This scholarly work — 15 years in the making — is also a deeply felt personal statement that merits a wide readership. It seeks to bring Jews back to necessary teachings about life and death that have been largely forgotten or neglected.

Explored idea of infinity

effort to keep his "Greek" and "Hebrew" writings separate, studiously avoiding Jewish references and texts in his philosophical writings and technical philosophical discussions or terminology in his talmudic lectures, a common spirit animates the two bodies of work.

His philosophic thought constitutes a fundamental critique of Western philosophy, which as he sees it, has been devoted to the idea of "totality," viewing man, society, and the world as an ordered whole, subject to both comprehension and control.

He counterposes to the idea of totality that of "infinity," wherein the "face," the unique personality of the other in all of his or her otherness, breaks through that totality, is subject to neither my comprehension nor my control, but on the contrary, subjects me to its moral claims.

But it is precisely this idea of infinity that Levinas sees as the fundamental teaching of Judaism. While Levinas was a traditional Jew, who accepted the authority of Jewish law in its entirety, for him the revelation of the law signified, first and foremost, the absolutely binding and transcendent nature of the moral imperative.

In this week's parshah, which recounts the giving of the Torah, we read that the Israelites stood "at the foot of the mountain" (literally, "underneath the mountain"). The rabbis comment that God overturned the mountain upon the Israelites and threatened them: "If you accept the Torah, all is well; but if not, here will be your grave."

For Levinas, this rabbinic statement means two things. First, the moral imperative is imposed upon me; that is, it originates not with me but with the claim the other makes upon me. I am free either to accept, ignore or even deny that claim. But the exercise of free will follows upon the moral imperative; it is not — contra Kant — that imperative's source.

Second, the only alternative to the acceptance of the Torah, to accepting the claim the other makes upon me, to looking at the face of the other in its infinity, is that violence whereby I seek to subject the other to my control, my plans, my goals, to forcibly make him or her part of a totality subject to my domination.

In a word, for Levinas, the only alternative to the "difficult liberty," the stern justice, the infinite responsibility for the face of the other demanded of us by the Torah, is the violence of totality, ultimately resulting in war and death.

It is striking that while scores and scores of studies about Levinas' "Greek" writings, his strictly philosophical works, have appeared, his "Hebrew" writings, his talmudic lectures and various essays on Jewish thought, have only just begun to attract attention. Fortunately, that is beginning to change. For one thing is certain: The alternative of infinity or totality, of Torah and life or violence and death, has never been as stark and clear and compelling as it is today.

TORONTO — Next time you attend a meeting at the Lipa Green Building, chances are you'll run into Frida Sloboder, food supervisor for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Sloboder, who began at the old Beverley Street building as a cook in 1977, now runs the kosher kitchen at the Lipa Green Building. Her duties include planning meals, training and supervising staff, and ordering all the supplies.

Sloboder, who left Russia with her husband and daughter in 1976, said her training as a teacher helped when it became her job to organize the new kitchen at Lipa Green.

"It was an empty kitchen and I had to organize everything, from hiring staff to buying all the supplies. My teaching experience helped because I had learned the importance of organization as well as as how to teach people their tasks. We serve dairy for breakfast and lunch and meat for dinner; so creating a kosher kitchen was a big part of my job. When we started, my staff had no experience, but under my guidance, they learned, one step at a time. Every hour was like a lesson at school."

Because her job is connected with the schedule of meetings or meals, Sloboder can work as many as 10 hours a day.

"Some days are long, with 100 people arriving for breakfast and then others arriving all day. On the days when nothing is planned, I have things cooked and frozen for future use. Again, my organizational skills come in handy."

She says that although she may plan the menu with the person in charge of the meeting, "it is often left up to me. I have a feeling for what people like. Dinner could be chicken and rice, cabbage rolls, meat balls or stews, and lunch may be some kind of pasta or kugel — anything with a Jewish flavor. I go through cookbooks or use my own recipes. Everything served comes from my heart.

Frida Sloboder

"Holidays are an important time of year and I make sure I give a holiday feeling to meetings and meals. A meeting set for Purim will find hamantaschen on the table; and during Chanukah, people are served potato latkes. Even though food is the main part of my job, I also make sure every meal has a special touch. Everything is sparkling clean, flowers may be on the table and food is arranged artistically. Touches like that can make the meeting."

Sloboder said she feels very loyal to the Jewish community who has been good to her throughout her career.

"I love working here. I meet good people and I've learned how to talk to everyone. In return, I watch every cent because I know money goes to Israel and to the Jewish community. I try not to overcharge and I throw nothing out. Leftovers are recycled into another dish and served again. There is no waste in my kitchen. I even try to serve home-baked goods if possible because it is less expensive to bake in my kitchen than to buy cake. I sleep well at night because I know I've done a good job."

MARCH FOR ISRAEL

For the first time, the Canadian Zionist Federation is getting together with United Jewish Appeal for festivities surrounding the annual Community March for Israel, on Sunday, May 26. This year's March, called Journey to Jerusalem, and the festival that follows, are dedicated to Jerusalem 3000. Seen here from last year's March are this year's co-chairs Maura Cooperberg and Jeff Cohen. This year's festival will be at the North York Centennial Centre on Finch Avenue.

Greater Toronto Area

So, you want your child to be a mentsh?

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Parents of preschoolers and toddlers take heart. Your child may be strong-willed, self-centred and non-compliant, but with proper parental guidance, he or she can learn to become a mentsh, according to two child development experts.

Psychologist Sarah Landy and social worker Barbara Miller, who are with Early Pathways Developmental Consultants, recently spoke about the challenge of raising a mentsh, to some 30 women from Young Women's Outreach, a division of United Jewish Appeal for women age 28 to 40.

Sandra Brown, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto also spoke, encouraging the women to get involved and consider positions of responsibility in the community.

Brown also told the group. "I like to think of myself as a mentsh because I was raised by mentshen."

Her comment underscored a key theme expressed by Landy and Miller: mentshlechkeit begins in the home.

Children who feel secure in their relationships with their parents tend to be considerate and caring of others, Landy said. A sound self-esteem is the basis for developing caring relationships, she added. "Unless you care for yourself, you can't care for others."

Parents also need to model caring behavior and establish rules and limits that reflect important values such as non-violence and generosity, she said.

Make more effort

Parents of only children may have "to make more of an effort" to help their son or daughter learn to share, because children with siblings "have to learn to live together and share," she said. "You have to work at it. Sharing doesn't take place naturally."

Having children pretend to be other people — puppets are a useful play tool — enables them to put themselves in other people's shoes; and encouraging them to talk about their feelings helps them develop a sense of empathy, Landy said.

Showing children how to negotiate disputes with siblings and friends also helps them learn to consider the other person's point of view, while explaining the reasons they are not allowed to do something helps them build a sense of conscience, she said.

Miller gave some practical ways of instilling Jewish social values in children. She said teaching about tzedakah begins in the home; family discussions about tzedakah and mitzvah projects will help children develop a sense of social responsibility and learn about the plight of others.

She suggested reinforcing mentsh-like behavior with small rewards such as stickers.

Sending get-well cards or calling people who are sick helps children develop a sensitivity to other's needs, she said. And inviting people to the home to celebrate Shabbat fosters the concept of hospitality, community and inclusiveness.

Supplementary school students match wits in Bible contest

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Teams of students from supplementary schools in the Greater Toronto Area match wits in the local Bible contest, an event sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) every February.

This year, eight teams with a total of 30 students from five schools — Beth Tikva, Orah, Temple Kol Ami, Bet Sefer Solel and the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS) competed. Holy Blossom Temple hosted the event.

Participants in the local contest do not compete for a grand prize — there's no trip to Israel as in the national contest.

They are basically motivated by "a love of learning Torah," says Yael Seliger, BJE's director of teacher development and personnel practices.

The board's coordinator of school services, Joyce Levine, agrees. "These students are most often learning on their own time," she says. "Year after year, the judges are most impressed with the level of knowledge of the students."

Levine, the contest organizer, says she spent two weeks preparing the questions, all of which were on Genesis this year.

The two winning teams were the Beth Tikva A team and the DJCS, with Beth Tikva in first place edging out the DJCS by five points, the equivalent of one question. Both teams had begun preparing for the contest in mid-December, doing most of the learning at home.

The contest was divided into three parts: two rounds of oral questions with two teams pitted against each other, and a Torah trivia round which involved all the teams at once.

CHAT vice-principal Richard Stall ran the trivia. The judges were Dr. Uri Korin, principal of Bialik; York University professor of Jewish Studies Martin Lockshin; Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of the Beth Tzedec Congregation; and Zvi Stanislavsky, the Israeli emissary to the BJE from the Torah Education Department of the World Zionist Organization.

The local Bible contest was held on the same day as the written exams for the regional Bible contest. More than 300 children across Canada took the written test to qualify for the national contest which takes place in April.

Eggleton chats up unity message

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Students at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) were recently urged by MP Art Eggleton to engage in dialogue with other students across the country, in order to promote national unity.

Eggleton, the minister of international trade and MP for York Centre, the riding in which the school is located, told the students, "We must talk to each other in order to get a sense of what our country is all about. We all own a part of this country and it is necessary to find out what is going on. Oct. 30 was definitely a wake-up call and students are important in forging the links that bring our country together.

"Although we won the referendum, it was a lot closer than we had anticipated and we cannot take the results for granted. Canada has always been inclusive of people of different races and religions and we must keep working to keep it together."

A student who had attended the Montreal rally that took place just prior to the referendum said he had spoken to several Quebecers and he gathered from them that they did not really know what to expect if Quebec separated.

"We must tell Quebec what they gain from being part of our country," Eggleton answered. "On the other hand, people in Ontario must understand why Quebec feels as it does. After the referendum, we went back to the drawing board and we intend to change our method of communication. We need to understand that they also have a point of view."

He said that the federal government misread what would happen during the referendum. "It was not a straight question and I think a lot of people voted Yes — not to separate, but rather, for a better deal. [Lucien] Bouchard attracted many voters and by the time we saw what was happening, we only had time to get stabilized."

Tu b'Shvat celebration attracts young people

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jerusalem Hall at the Zionist Centre overflowed with children and youth who came to celebrate Tu b'Shvat.

Event organizers had expected 60 to 70 people, but twice as many turned up to take part in the games and songs.

Co-sponsored by eight Zionist organizations, including four youth movements, this was the first time they had "made a concerted effort" to organize an event together, Risa Epstein, executive director of Young Judaea told The CJN.

She praised the efforts of the volunteer youth leaders from the various movements, who had planned the entire program.

Retired brigadier-general Doron Kadmiel, the Jewish National Fund shaliach, told the audience that three million trees had been planted in Israel for Tu b'Shvat this year. He said a new park named in memory of the late Yitzhak Rabin, was created along the Jerusalem highway to replace the trees destroyed by last July's forest fire — the biggest in Israel's history.

He noted that the park was appropriately named for Rabin, because the late prime minister had been among those who opened up that road in 1948. The trees also commemorate the 3000th anniversary of Jerusalem.

More than 200 million trees have been planted in Israel since 1897, he said.

Canadian Young Judaea, Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, Betar/Tagar, Israel Youth Program Centre, Youth and Hechalutz Department of the Canadian Zionist Federation, Tzabar and JNF were the event co-sponsors.

Funding was provided by Federation through the action committee for Jewish continuity. Funding has also been made available for two more events to be organized by the same group of co-sponsors: an ecology day in April and a Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration in May.

Put More Money In Your Pocket.

Borrowing Your RSP Contribution Can Actually SAVE You Money.

One of the few remaining ways Canadians can reduce the income tax they pay is by making contributions to an RSP. However, few of us have the cash required to make our maximum contribution.

By borrowing your maximum contribution, you can lower the amount of tax you pay now, and actually keep more of your hard earned money. Consider the following example.

John, age 30, has a maximum RSP contribution limit of $8,100. So far, he's only been able to save $2,100. Let's consider the benefits of John borrowing the additional $6,000 he needs to reach his limit.

Scenario #1

John decides not to borrow, leaving his total 1995 RSP contribution amount at $2,100. Assuming his combined federal and provincial tax rate is about 42%, his tax savings would be $882 (42% x $2,100). If his $2,100 RSP investment earns 10% per year over 25 years, it will grow to $23,000.

Scenario #2

John borrows the additional $6,000 to reach his goal of making his maximum contribution of $8,100. At his combined tax rate of 42%, his tax savings will be $3,402. If he receives this as a tax refund, he can reduce his loan immediately to $2,598.

$6,000	original amount borrowed
$3,402	less his tax refund amount applied to the loan
$2,598	new loan balance

John has also made a big difference in the value of his savings for his retirement years. By borrowing the $6,000 required to make his maximum contribution, John's $8,100 contribution, earning 10%, will have grown to $88,000 at age 55. That's $65,000 more than if he only contributed $2,100! That's the power of borrowing your maximum contribution.

We'll prepare an RSP loan for you in twenty minutes. Visit your local branch for more details.

Uniform definition of hate crimes urged

The report, written by Julian Roberts, a professor in the department of criminology at the University of Ottawa, is an analysis of recent hate crime statistics, followed by 20 recommendations for action.

Prepared for the federal Justice Department, the report collected statistics on hate crimes from various Canadian police forces, from B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights and from gay and lesbian groups in Toronto and Montreal.

Government should listen: page 30

Referring to the situation in Toronto, Roberts found that racial minorities account for half of all hate crime incidents reported to Metro Toronto police, followed by religious groups (35 percent), groups defined by their sexual orientation (10 percent) and groups based on ethnicity or nationality (five percent).

"Not surprisingly...the vast majority of religious hate crimes (89 percent) were anti-Semitic in nature."

The report went on to find that "religious groups were more likely to be the victims of property crimes: almost a third of mischief offences were directed at religious groups but only seven percent of assaults were directed against this target category."

Roberts calls for the adoption of a uniform definition of hate crimes so police forces across the country would use the same criteria when recording incidents. He suggests "hate crimes should be defined as crimes in which hatred or bias was in whole or in part responsible for the commission of the offence."

Other recommendations include:

- creation of specialized police hate crime units across the country.
- closer contact between police and communities most at risk for hate crimes.
- more public education on the topic.
- better contact with gay and lesbian communities "in light of the extremely low reporting rate and the disproportionately high rate of violence in hate crimes directed at gays and lesbians."

Roberts speculated that as many as 60,000 hate crimes are committed annually in nine major Canadian cities — a figure that came as no surprise to Jewish community organizations that study the issue.

"I'm not shocked" by the figure, said lawyer Marvin Kurz, a spokesperson for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. The annual League audit on crimes committed against Jews speculates that only one in 10 such crimes is ever reported. While it is difficult to quantify such crimes, "we've had the view that hate crimes are underreported," he said.

The study shows that "it's not just the bleating of a few minority groups but that hate crimes are much more common in society and must be taken more seriously," Kurz said.

Steven Shulman, a spokesperson on community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said there were no definitive figures for the number of hate crimes, but "we agree it's certainly under-reported.

Kurz called for legislative change that would require judges to consider hate-motivation as an aggravating factor in sentencing. Under current law, it is simply another factor that may be considered by judges, he said.

Kurz and Shulman both called for creation of a centralized statistical registry to collect data on hate crimes.

Tackling Internet hate

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Internet providers must take the responsibility for keeping hate messages off the Net, said Sol Littman, Canadian director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Canada.

Speaking at a community meeting at the Jewish Community Centre, Littman said that through the Canadian Council of Internet Providers, which operates across the country, the contents of Internet messages can be controlled, and the government doesn't have to be involved.

This is not censorship, he maintained, but merely Internet providers exercising their right to keep distasteful material off the Net. Canadian media editors, he said, do this all the time.

For example, he said, the Toronto Star, for which he used to work, edits, rewrites or omits material it is not satisfied with. There is no reason why Internet providers can't do the same thing.

The trouble is that the people who services the Internet "don't want to get involved" in regulations respecting Canada's existing hate laws, he added.

Quebec federalist group draws significant support

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The envelopes with cheques ranging from $12 to $1,000 began arriving at the office of the Quebec Committee for Canada (QCC) the day after it placed full-page ads in the Gazette and Le Devoir asking support for its campaign to have the Canadian government immediately begin the process of establishing a new province of Quebec made up of those areas where federalists predominate.

"One fellow from the building walked in and signed up all his staff," says Allen Nutik, co-chair with Gary Shapiro, of the latest, and probably most aggressive, partitionist group.

The response — over 500 pieces of mail (most with money) within a week — to an unknown entity that advertised without even providing the names of those behind it, is a testament to the willingness of many who fear separation to grasp at any seeming life-saver.

The QCC, located in a small Decarie Square office, has the goal of becoming a broad-based federalist movement, not confined to anglophone Montrealers. It intends to form a board reflecting that image.

Set up as a not-for-profit corporation, the QCC's start-up costs mainly came out of the pockets of Nutik, 51, and Shapiro, 40, both small businessmen. There's no tax receipt for contributors.

A "significant" number of respondents have been francophones, said Nutik, pointing to one from the Université du Québec à Chicoutimi. Not everyone's friendly; one envelope contains a drawing of a bomb with a lit fuse, the word Boum! and signed FLQ.

But Nutik is not intimidated. On the contrary, he appears as if he would enjoy nothing more than a verbal dust-up with every dogmatic sovereigntist from Lucien Bouchard down.

"I'm angry, they can't do this to us," he asserts. "I refuse to be a hostage in my own country."

Shapiro says the QCC is different from the other partition groups because it is more proactive. "We don't want to just talk about it in the media ... We want to have tens or hundreds of thousands of members so that we will have the clout to force the federal government to resolve the political situation which is devastating this city and province."

Political uncertainty killing Montreal's economy, says QCC

The QCC's next step will be distributing 250,000 brochures.

Nutik, who is president of the Congregation Shaar Hashomayim Men's Club, has a reputation for asking pointed questions and irritating the establishment. Shapiro, who has a lower profile, is YM-YWHA president.

The QCC position is that the longstanding constitutional stalemate and political uncertainty are killing Montreal economically and have put the lives of Quebecers who want to remain Canadian on hold.

Its concern is not the when and if of another referendum. Rather the QCC wants the federal government to right now determine which areas of Quebec should remain under Canadian jurisdiction in the event of sovereignty. The rest of Quebec can form its own nation.

Nutik and Shapiro feel that for too long Ottawa has allowed sovereigntists to dictate the terms of the country's breakup and not done enough to protect loyal Canadians in Quebec. As in a divorce, they say, both parties should realize before negotiations begin "that nobody gets it all."

The logistics of partition is not the QCC's worry. "The people will have spoken. It's up to the federal government to find the formula," Nutik said.

Dr. Isadore M. Cass F.R.C.P.(C.)

Passed away January 24 at 79 after a short illness.

PHYSICIAN - SCHOLAR - TEACHER - MOHEL
BENEFACTOR - particularly of Machanaim in Kiryat Gan, Israel

During a visit to Israel in 1971, Dr. Cass was impressed by the efforts of a young rabbi, Sholom Dov Wolpo, who obtained a few prefab huts where pre-school immigrant children were given lunch and received religious instruction, while their parents worked. The older children, out of secular school at 1 p.m. roamed the streets and were becoming delinquents. Dr. Cass initiated and continued for the rest of his life, a massive fundraising effort that helped establish one of the most unique and highly regarded educational institutions in the country, for secular and religious studies which today has an enrollment of over 3,000 students. This includes a yeshiva built in memory of his brother, Rabbi Samuel Cass, who, with his family (wife Annabelle Goldfine and son Ely Michael) were killed in a traffic accident in 1979. Many graduates of this yeshiva have now become prominent rabbis throughout Israel. His family hopes to continue carying on his important work.

Dr. Cass was the first Jewish physician to perform ritual circumcisions and later trained a number of doctors to do the same. According to his records, and most of them still exist, he performed since 1945 over 40,000 brisen throughout Canada and the eastern United States.

Numerous friends and former patients have been relating how Dr. Cass touched their lives by helping and influencing them. His family has been taping these "Dr. Cass" stories and intends to print them into an archival book. Anyone having a story to tell, please phone Miriam Cass (416) 483-6154.

Dr. Cass is survived by his wife Miriam; children Sharon and Meyer Toole, Dr. Hyla Cass, of California, Judy and Earl Saltzman and Elaine Cass of California; 7 grandchildren and 3 great-grandchildren; brothers and sisters Harry, Betty Heller, Al, Miriam Cass, Zelda Fink and Dr. Eli. He was predeceased by brothers Ben, Rabbi Samuel and Julius.

Memorial donations may be sent to: Dr. Isadore Cass Memorial Fund, c/o Benjamin Foundation, 2401 Steeles Ave. W., Downsview, Ont. M3J 2P1. Canadian tax-deductible receipts will be issued and all money will be sent to Machanaim in Kiryat Gat.

David Goldstein selected to chair 1997 UJA Campaign

David Goldstein

UJA's successful 1996 campaign might be a tough act to follow...but if leadership has anything to do with it, things look good for 1997. That's because UJA has chosen not one, not two, but three of the community's finest to be at the helm.

David Goldstein, UJA's 1997 campaign Chairman will be working closely with campaign Vice-Chairs David Engel and Michael Daren. Among Goldstein's goals are "finding ways to digest government budget cuts, deciding what Jewish services should be all about and how UJA can support them."

Goldstein, 57, began his professional life in his family's lumber company before branching out into other businesses. After spending time in New York, Goldstein returned to Toronto, married Bonnie Chapnik and established his own independent chain of gas stations. He then went on to build a successful portfolio of investments which has included Speedy Muffler King, Dominion Propane Corporation and Fifth Wheel Truck Stops.

Goldstein's career in community service is equally diverse and impressive. He has been active in UJA for decades and has held many other voluntary positions, including President of the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce, Governor of Beth Tzedec synagogue, Director of JNF and Chairman of Baycrest Foundation. Last year, Goldstein received Baycrest's Men's Service Group Man of the Year Award.

"Now," he said, "is a critical time for the community and for Israel. However, the 1997 campaign is already off to a terrific start because of the Three Year Vision and we're confident of maintaining the community spirit that was reflected in Campaign '96."

Last year's Three Year Vision Campaign is approaching $35 million in pledges for 1996 and an equal combined total for 1997 and 1998.

Michael Daren

David Engel

New Campaign Vice-Chairs value people

UJA's 1997 campaign Vice-Chairs Michael Daren and David Engel have big plans for 1997 which include building an effective management team and developing leadership within the community.

Determined to capitalize on the success of last year's campaign and the popularity of the Three Year Vision, Daren has wasted little time recruiting members for this year's campaign management crew. "We're getting a dynamic team together," says Daren. "Everyone we've asked to join so far has accepted."

Daren, has been active with UJA for 6 years. As 1995 Co-Chair of UJA's Major Gifts Division, he helped to raise more than $11 million.

Daren feels strongly about continuing on the path set by 1996 Campaign Co-chairs Carol Kassel and Charles Gold. "We have a duty to fulfill the commitments made by Carol and Chuck to all those who supported the Campaign and believed in the Three Year Vision."

For the last ten years, David Engel has rarely said "no" when UJA came calling. He has chaired UJA's Marketing Division as well as the Young Leadership Network and changed the way canvassers relate to donors as 1995 Chairman of UJA's Delta Force.

Known affectionately as "Delta Dave." Engel came up with several innovative ideas to improve donor/canvasser relations including personalized thank you letters from canvassers.

As Vice-Chair of the 1997 Campaign, Engel plans to focus on people. "Aside from addressing the ever-growing needs of the community," says Engel, "we really need to spend more time on individual volunteers in order to develop and utilize their potential leadership skills."

Minister meets with Jewish communal leaders

Ontario's Community and Social Services Minister, David Tsubouchi, toured Jewish Vocational Service facilities last week. He also talked to JVS staff and clients. Jewish Vocational Service is one of the Federation's beneficiary agencies.

JVS Executive Director, Ed Segalowitz, presented to Tsubouchi proposals for future cooperative ventures between the agency, the ministry and private enterprise.

Tsubouchi agreed to ongoing dialogue at a meeting with senior representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, the Federation and Jewish Vocational Service.

During the meeting, Alan Sandler, the Federation's Chairman of Community Planning and Allocations, stressed to Tsubouchi the importance of maintaining services supplied by ethno-cultural and religious communities. Tsubouchi, who applauded the Jewish community for being "well-organized," expressed sensitivity toward the ethnic, cultural and religious needs of community service recipients, and agreed to arrange further meetings between agencies and ministry staff.

Federation President Sandy Brown and CJC Ontario Region Chair Moshe Ronen were impressed with what Brown called the minister's "genuine interest" in the community's concerns and looked forward to a constructive dialogue.

CJC Ontario Region Executive Director Manuel Prutschi briefed the minister on discussions between the Jewish community and others concerning the impact of government budget cuts. Prutschi also stressed that "communities and government should work together constructively as partners," and asked that communities not be treated as special interests but as "representatives of the public interest."

Other participants at the meeting were JVS President Peter Shenfield, together with Vice-Presidents Igor Korenzvit and Michael Miller, Marlene Sklar, Vice-Chair of CJC's Political Liaison Committee, Federation Executive Vice-President Allan Reitzes, Associate Federation Director Morris Zbar and the Federation's Senior Fund Executive, Paul Marcus.

Historic session for youth leaders

For the first time in many years, leaders of Toronto's Jewish youth organizations met to discuss common causes.

The Federation and the Board of Jewish Education inivited youth representatives from all religious and ideological backgrounds to discuss the possibility of creating a unified body for youth services.

The highly energized group spent the day sharing ideas and learning about programs offered by different organizations. Career consultant Loretta Helman led participants through an exercise to explore new directions in career development.

BBYO Canada Director Elizabeth Sokolsky was excited about being able to interact with her professional colleagues and looks forward to "agencies working together to provide better service."

Gary Levine, Director of Student Activities at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, hopes leaders will opt for working together. "A unified Council of Directors could serve as a resource of experience and vision that could enrich the future of Toronto's Jewish community," Levine said. "For years, if not decades, the committed, dedicated professionals who work for Jewish youth groups have been molding our children and building generation after generation of Jewish commitment."

Conference participants decided to form a steering committee for further action. Susan Jackson, one of the coordinators of the conference, was pleased with the outcome and is confident that another meeting on specific issues will be held in the spring.

Federation races toward the web

There's less than two weeks to go before the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto launches into cyberspace with its new web site.

Countdown to the web. Federation internet volunteers Bob Cherniak, Jonathan Grossman and Jennifer Cohen make last minute adjustments to the Federation site which opens on March 5.

On the evening of March 5, millions of internet users will be able to access Jewish Toronto at http://www.feduja.org, the Federation's home page.

Jewish Toronto will include a community calendar and directory, a youth section, recent news releases, Federation publications and links to other sites.

"It's going to be a very busy place," predicts Art Benjamin, who chairs the Federation's internet steering committee.

Jonathan Grossman, responsible for the site's content and development sees Jewish Toronto as an extension of Jewish tradition. "The site fulfills a fundamental premise of Judaism, which is to exchange ideas and ask questions," he notes. "There is no better technology to facilitate community building."

A team of 75 volunteers, led by Dr. Jay Brodbar, the Federation's Assistant Director of Community Planning & Allocations, has been working on Jewish Toronto for seven months.

Brodbar calls the site an "evolving" one, designed to connect the community. However, Bob Cherniak, the project's technical services specialist, expects it to do much more than that.

"It will change the way people live," he forecasts. "It will offer a link to many who only have a tenuous link right now."

Jews in the city centre: Proud, diverse and alive

From Davenport to Dundas. From Dufferin to the Don Valley. The signs of revival are everywhere.

An increasing number of young Jewish singles and families are attracted to Toronto's downtown Jewish community. They're looking for alternative ways of being Jewish and they're finding them in the most unexpected places.

The Danforth Orthodox Minyan is held in a Greek restaurant on Danforth Avenue. The 40 or so members gather every week for Shabbat services. The Jewish Film Festival, the Downtown Jewish Learning Council and the Jewish Feminist Conference are just some of many Jewish programs and events in the city core.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre houses everything from Shabbat services to lunchtime learning programs to rooftop Israeli dancing. BJCC Director Bill Emery is confident that offering a wide variety of choices is the best way to guarantee the community's future. York University sociology professor Stuart Schoenfeld says "variety adds strength to the community."

Toronto's downtown Jewish community, numbering approximately 15,000, is unique. No other North American city, except for New York, boasts such vibrant urban Jewish life.

In this issue, Adi Waksman takes a detailed look at the past, present and future of Jewish life in the city.

Yesterday's downtown Jewish life: Community meant everything

By the 1930's, Toronto's Jewish community had become a thriving centre of Jewish life right in the heart of the city. Jewish owned businesses, shuls and schools dotted the area from Spadina Avenue to Shaw Street and from Dundas to Bloor. Today, one can still see evidence of the past in the synagogues and shops that remain part of an everchanging downtown landscape.

Community Matters contributing editor Adi Waksman recently strolled down the streets of old Jewish Toronto with David Greenberg reminiscing about his childhood days at 98 Major Street.

What was life like for the son of a shochet who lived with his parents, four brothers and sisters and a boarder in a house with only one bathroom? It was typical of life for most young Jewish boys growing up in Toronto during the 1930s.

Butter, cheese, cream and eggs, fresh every day! That's what the sign says. David Greenberg stands in front of what used to be Mandel's Creamery on Baldwin St.

"My two brothers and I slept in one bed," recalled Greenberg, brother of the legendary "Dr. Joe," whose practice is still located around the corner from where he grew up. "Like most families at the time, we didn't have very much, but we had a lot."

Greenberg remembers with fondness a close knit community where on Yom Tov "you would see everyone walking along College Street exchanging greetings." And when Yom Tov was over, who could resist stopping by Harbord Bakery for a bagel or something sweet; half a dozen for a nickel or one for a penny?

On Friday afternoons, neighbourhood women would bring their cholent pots to the bakery to cook over shabbos and reclaim them the following day for lunch. "Chaim would open the door for us in the laneway," explained Greenberg, "and he never mixed any of the pots up."

Many Jewish kids, including Phil Givens, Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster, attended Harbord Collegiate. Some went to Brunswick Talmud Torah, Darcy Street Talmud Torah or Mr. Day's Cheder for their Jewish studies. "People walking down the street," said Greenberg, "could hear us reciting the Shma Israel from the 2nd floor of Mr. Day's school."

For fun, there were baseball games at Landsdowne playground or basketball at Central Tech, College United Church and Jarvis Collegiate.

Many evenings and weekends were also spent watching movies at neighbourhood theatres. The Garden Theatre, the Playhouse and the Bellevue were favorite cinema spots before moving on to the Chicken Palace or Bassels for something to nosh. "Daisy's on College," Greenberg confided, "was where I used to take some of my dates after dancing at the Top Hat or Palais Royale."

Greenberg also remembers his many odd jobs; delivering pharmaceuticals for 10 cents an hour and recently cleaned clothes for $10 a week. For lunch, there was always a tough choice between Welts Deli at Major St. and Brunswick Avenue, where a sandwich cost 5 cents or Beckers Deli with two larger sandwiches for 15 cents.

During World War II, the community's newly arrived prosperity was soured by lost lives in Europe. "On three short blocks on Major Street between Ulster and College, three of my friends died," Greenberg said.

Synagogues were popping up on every corner as more and more Jews moved into the area. "At one time," according to Greenberg, "there were probably 60 shuls and shtetls in the area." Some, including the Kiever Shul, Shaarei Tzedec and Anshei Minsk, still maintain their original structures today.

"It was a time," Greenberg reminisced, "when you knew almost everyone who crossed your path and Jewish life was everywhere because we were everywhere."

A confident future for Toronto's downtown Jewry

If the last 10 years are any indication of what's happening in the city core's Jewish community, the future looks brighter than ever.

York University sociology professor Stuart Schoenfeld says the downtown Jewish community "has never been stronger." During the late 1960's and early 70's, he notes, a reverse migration began, with many single young professionals, families and older couples moving downtown. "A high percentage of Jews living downtown are from outside the province or outside Canada," he adds.

In the last two years alone, two new congregations have sprung up. So have several other community and neighbourhood based groups and organizations. A seniors residence, Habayit Shelanu, opened last year at Spadina and Davenport.

The Bloor Jewish Community Council, an umbrella body representing dowtown Jewish organizations, has grown from 9 to 17 members in 5 years.

According to Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) Director Bill Emery, "the JCC is wide open for business."

"The traffic at the BJCC on Sunday morning," said Schoenfeld, "is really something to see. Every available inch is being used."

Simon Kalkstein, the downtown supervisor for Jewish Family and Child Service, based at the BJCC, expects the community to continue growing as it becomes more pluralistic. "I can't get over how many young families and singles are moving in."

Jewish faces in the city centre

Downtown Jews are an eclectic bunch - young, old, observant, non-observant, affiliated and non-affiliated - all expressing their Jewish identity in their own way. Their common thread is community pride and their appreciation of a dynamic urban lifestyle.

Peter and Elaine Gold have been downtowners for 15 years and currently live on Walmer Rd., in the annex, with their 4 children. They've been attending Shabbat services at the First Narayever Congregation on Brunswick Ave for 9 years and take part in many of the shul's activities.

Their children, Leah, 12 and 8 year old Naomi are both students at Bialik Hebrew Day School on Viewmount Ave, but Elaine says the distance is not troublesome. "We used to rely on carpools from neigbours on our street but now the kids go easily by subway."

Kosher food isn't much of an issue either. The Golds can now find a selection at the Shoppers Drug Mart on Bloor Street near Spadina Ave. or at Honest Ed's.

Karen Loomer, who lives in the Bathurst and Dupont area with her husband, Martin, and two daughters, moved to the city centre over five years ago because the community was becoming so vital. "We're able to walk to shul," says Karen, "it's as if we're living in a village."

Sidonie Loomer, 4, attends United Synagogue Day School on Bathurst just south of Eglinton. "We had already made the commitment to Jewish education," Karen explains, "and USDS isn't very far away."

The Golds have always enjoyed living downtown. Back row: Peter, Danny and Aaron. Bottom: Leah , Naomi and Elaine.

Architect creates 'docuportrait' of grandfather's heroics

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

David Fleishman

TORONTO — Most of us have to settle for simply telling a few people what great guys our grandfathers were. David Fleishman plans to tell millions about his.

The CBC has already committed to airing on its Canadian Reflections program a 23-minute "docuportrait" about Morris Saxe, Fleishman's larger-than-life grandfather. Vision TV also plans to broadcast the film.

Fleishman, a 39-year-old architect turned writer, wants to get inside his grandfather's head and figure out what motivated him to rescue some 79 Jewish orphans from Poland before World War II. But more, Fleishman plans a complete sketch of Saxe, who, apart from having been a hero, was a true Canadian Jewish pioneer. The project's working title, A Man of Conscience, pretty well sums it up.

Saxe was born in an agricultural colony near Kiev in 1878 and studied farming. After a stint in the Russian cavalry, he came to Canada in 1902 and became the first Jewish student at the Ontario Agricultural College in Guelph. He went on to open the first creamery in Acton, Ont, where he also owned a tannery and several other businesses.

A proponent of the back-to-the-land movement, Saxe bought his first farm in 1907 and later founded the Federated Jewish Farmers of Ontario, which eventually had 150 members.

By 1917, the creamery was flourishing, so Saxe opened a second in Georgetown, where he moved his growing family. Because he spoke several languages, he served as a translator for the federal government during World War I, making important contacts along the way.

On one of his farms in Georgetown, Saxe set up an agricultural school where new immigrants could learn farming. More federal contacts were picked up through the Federated Jewish Farmers, which assisted Jewish agricultural immigrants to Canada.

By 1926, the agricultural classes had become the Canadian Jewish Farm School, which provides much of the focus for A Man of Conscience. For it was about this time Saxe was approached by an Eli Greenblatt of Detroit, who helped run a Jewish orphanage in the Polish town of Mezhirech.

Greenblatt had heard of Saxe's federal contacts and experience with immigration and Jewish communal matters. Greenblatt complained he could not bring the Polish orphans into the United States because of restrictive quotas. Could Saxe help?

Saxe began pulling strings, eventually using every ounce of shlep he had ever acquired. Letters began flowing from the farm school, of which Saxe was president, to the Department of Immigration and Colonization, as it was then known, pleading the case for bringing the orphans to Canada as farm trainees.

Saxe even struck up a cordial correspondence with the immigration department's assistant deputy minister Frederick Charles Blair — the same Frederick Charles Blair who emerges as the anti-Semitic villain in Irving Abella and Harold Troper's None is Too Many, which chronicles Canada's dismal record in admitting Jewish refugees before and after World War II.

Finally, success, in spite of the tight quotas of the day. In June, 1927, the first group of 38 orphans arrived, along with a teacher and two domestics. In October, 1929, the second group came, with a music teacher. They were aged 13 to 20.

Saxe put all his own money into the undertaking, while his wife and the two domestics cooked for the children.

Saxe and Greenblatt surely would have brought over more orphans but sadly, the effort fell apart, partly because of the Depression but also because officials discovered that not all the children were orphans, not all stayed on the farm and several used Canada to springboard to the States.

Saxe's heroism, his grandson points out, is best seen in the fact that the town of Mezhirech was wiped off the map during the Holocaust. His efforts plainly saved 79 lives.

Morris Saxe

The film plans interviews with several surviving orphans, now in their 80s (two are in Toronto), as well as archival footage, home movies and re-enactments using actors in period dress. Fleishman will be writer and co-producer, while Cayle Chernin, who several years ago made In the Shadows, a shocking film about Syrian Jewry, has signed on as director.

As for Blair, whose contempt for Jews is described as "boundless" in None is Too Many, Fleishman says the whole operation couldn't have happened without him. "He and my grandfather had a very good relationship," he says, adding, though, that the project's souring may have contributed to Blair's future attitude toward Jewish immigration to Canada.

Fleishman was spurred to the project after seeing Schindler's List. "That was the spark. I want to convey that one man can make a difference." Saxe died in 1965, when Fleishman was just nine. "I remember him," says the grandson, "as this great big man." Bigger, it seems, in more ways than one.

So far, Fleishman has raised just a fraction of the funds needed for the project. Contact him at 416-515-1670.

Federal government should heed the advice of hate crimes report

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — When I was a newly arrived reporter in Winnipeg back in 1981, I received an anonymous telephone call one morning that a synagogue in the north end of the city had been attacked by "vandals" during the night. Swastikas had been spray painted on the outside walls.

I rushed over to get the details just as workers were finished cleaning up. Neither the rabbi nor local B'nai Brith officials wanted anything written about it.

I couldn't understand.

"If we publicized it every time a swastika is painted on a synagogue, the papers would carry nothing else," one official told me. "Besides, it only encourages them if they read about it. It's best to ignore it."

I was stunned. I couldn't believe there were crimes in my country that victims felt should go unreported. It went against everything I believed as a journalist about the need for an informed public to be able to react with outrage against hate crimes.

I was subsequently disabused of my naiveté three years later, when the Franco-Manitoban society leaders took the same "please, no press" attitude after their community centre was fire-bombed by bigots and plate-glass windows smashed one night at the height of the French-language crisis.

Much has changed since then. For the past 13 years, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith has collected accurate and comprehensive statistics on hate crimes and "incidents" of anti-Semitic activity across Canada, and publishes them annually in an Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents, which is a valuable source of information for journalists and academic researchers.

One of those researchers is Prof. Julian Roberts of the Criminology Department of the University of Ottawa, who has just finished a report on a statistical analysis of hate crimes in Canada. It took him the better part of a year and cost about $15,000. It's possibly the best investment the Justice Department made last year.

The report reveals a lot about hate crimes and makes about a dozen good recommendations that wouldn't cost the government very much to implement.

The professor discovered there is no standard definition of "hate crime" reporting among police forces across Canada. As a result, there are incredible discrepancies between the number of hate crimes reported in one city compared to another. In fact, police statistics don't mean very much, he concludes.

In Toronto, for instance, an offence is classified as a "hate crime" when it is based "solely" upon a victim's race, religion, nationality, ethnic origin, sexual orientation, gender or disability.

In Ottawa, the offence needs only to be "motivated" (in the investigating officer's opinion) by the offender's hate or bias (as perceived by the police officer) to be called a hate crime.

That's why huge Toronto ends up reporting only 155 hate crimes in 1993, while sleepy Ottawa ends up leading the country with 176 reported hate crimes for the same period, even though Ottawa has much smaller visible minority and Jewish communities and an overall crime rate only a fifth of Toronto's.

Roberts says the Toronto definition of a hate crime is too narrow. Since when is any crime motivated only by one reason?

Wait — it gets better. The RCMP doesn't even bother collecting hate crime statistics. The Sûreté du Québec and the Ontario Provincial Police both say that hate crimes are things that happen only in big cities, so they don't keep stats either.

We need a standard definition of a hate crime and we need police forces that keep statistics, Roberts says.

Hate crime is far more common in Canada than people generally believe, he says. About 1,000 hate crimes were reported by police across Canada last year, but anywhere between 25,000 and 60,000 more were committed and never reported, he says.

And that's what makes B'nai Brith's annual audit such a "vital resource" he says. It catches incidents missed by police. People have a right to know the extent of hate crimes so they can deal with the problem. Roberts says he wishes the gay community and the black, Asian and East Indian communities kept statistics as B'nai Brith does, because police alone can't be expecting to keep track of the extent of the problem, no matter how good their definitions or their record-keeping becomes.

That's because so few hate crimes (like sexual assaults) are ever reported to police. Many visible minority people in Canada don't trust police, for a variety of reasons. Many people don't want to make a big thing out of what they consider a small incident. Many people fear reprisal or don't believe the police can solve the case.

Right now, desecrating Jewish cemeteries, spray painting swastikas on synagogues and similar hate crimes are prosecuted under the "mischief" section of the Criminal Code. It makes a hate crime sound so innocuous, Roberts says, like something no worse than spray painting your initials on a school.

Judges sentencing recidivist bigots for more serious hate crimes have no way of telling from current police computer printouts the nature of the "mischief" previously committed.

Roberts says a separate criminal code offence entitled "desecrating religious symbols, properties or institutions" should be put into the Criminal Code to separate hate criminals from ordinary mischief makers.

The government could do worse than take his advice.

CJC-P outlines Jewish issues for B.C. candidates

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — As British Columbia prepares for a provincial election this fall, members of the B.C. Jewish community "have an important role to play in the political process," says Dr. Michael Elterman, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P).

To encourage political activity the CJC-P political liaison committee has produced a 50-page "action document," which outlines issues of concern to the B.C. Jewish community, "to sensitize candidates of all political parties and all levels of government about these issues."

CJC-P offers its support to all levels of government in addressing the problems, says Elterman.

"The ever-present shadow of racism, prejudice and discrimination persists and threatens the integrity of our society," says the action document. Despite efforts of various levels of government and law enforcement agencies, hate propaganda and its outgrowth, bias crime, continue to persist and cyberforce propaganda is growing rapidly.

Congress says the B.C. attorney general should give high priority to monitoring racist groups and ensuring prosecution where appropriate. "The need remains to continually monitor use of the Canadian Human Rights Act and B.C.'s Human Rights Act, as well as the Multiculturalism Act. Congress suggests the B.C. government appoint a commissioner of multiculturalism to report directly to the Legislature.

CJC-P calls for increased trade between B.C. and Israel. In 1994, bilateral trade between Canada and Israel totalled $327 million, less than one percent of each country's international trade.

Under a new free trade deal between the two countries, B.C. exports to Israel will increase. In 1994, B.C. exports totalled $6 million, mainly in wood products, mechanical appliances, electrical machinery and optical equipment. B.C. could supply Israel with raw and processed materials such as sulphur, aluminum and paper, while Israel can step up exports, especially in hi-tech and electronics.

Winnipeg seeking Argentinian Jews

By MYRON LOVE

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community here is looking to Argentina to increase the city's Jewish population.

Last November, Larry Hurtig, his son Jack, and Tom Carson, Manitoba deputy minister of culture, heritage and citizenship, travelled to Buenos Aires on behalf of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) and the provincial government, to meet with Jewish organizations and inform them of the benefits of life here. The week-long trip was funded by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

The initiative grew from a meeting on a flight to Buenos Aires between Janice Filmon, wife of Manitoba Premier Garry Filmon, and a Jewish Argentinian. The Argentinian was returning from Canada where he was considering moving his family.

Janice Filmon suggested he consider Winnipeg. He and his wife subsequently visited, liked the city and are making plans to immigrate here. He and another Argentinian couple organized the Hurtigs' visit.

"We were overwhelmed by the welcome we received," says Larry Hurtig of his visit. They met with about 200 people representing 100 families.

Many of Buenos Aires' 175,000-member Jewish community want to leave, he reports. They are concerned about security (especially since the bombing of the Jewish community building in 1994) and the econmomy — there is about 18 percent unemployment in Buenos Aires.

"Many Jewish Argentinians are considering leaving for Israel," Hurtig says. "No one else has come from Canada in an official capacity before and the results have been gratifying. We are still getting faxes. We had two engineers and a computer teacher in an ORT school in Buenos Aires come here recently to look into job opportunities. There is a demand for people in the city's thriving computer industry.

Hurtig praises Winnipeg City Hall and the provincial government for their help and cooperation in the project. He reports that the WJCC is also taking steps to try to help more of our own young people find jobs through contacts with local Jewish business people and professionals that will allow them to stay here.

Marx committee holds hearings on CJC plenary

having been plenary chair up till about a month before the event.

Hecht said he was most disturbed by an anonymous envelope sent to Montreal media just before the plenary, that contained, in Hecht's words, "false allegations of unethical business practices ..." Hecht demanded an apology from CJC, and received one of sorts from Marx.

"All right-thinking people find this odious and pernicious ... If I could apologize for the Jewish community I would," Marx said.

While some, including Joffe, found offensive Hecht's paying the registration, transportation and other costs of supporters, Marx commented it was not against the bylaws nor unprecedented in presidential elections.

National credentials committee chair Lawrence Freeman laid the blame squarely on Hecht. "It is my personal belief that this was a deliberate attempt to undermine the system by overloading the application process and making it impossible to perform the necessary checks. This approach to elections was not in keeping with the spirit."

Neither he nor Reisa Teitelbaum, acting chair of the Quebec credentials committee, would estimate how many people were ultimately turned away.

Backing up Hecht were Allen Nutik and Rabbi Reuben Poupko, Hecht campaigners, who called for a nullification of the election. Reached by phone in Florida, Rabbi Poupko said the problem was that accreditation of organizational delegates was far stricter than in the past. It had been assumed, he continued, that most applications would be taken on "good faith and trust."

Marx announced that his committee should table its report by the end of April, and that it would be made public notwithstanding approval by CJC.

Committee members present at the hearing were: Marilyn Blumer, Les Scheininger, Keith Landy, Victor Goldberg, and "participating observers" Myer Bick and Sharon Wolfe. Not present were Renee Switzer Bellas and Rabbi Reuven Bulka.

Apnea may be sign of underlying disease

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Snoring is more than a social embarrassment if it is a sign of obstructive sleep interruption (apnea).

Apnea is the cause of five to seven times as many car accidents as people have without apnea, and such patients must lose their driving licenses.

These were among highlights of a review of apnea recently given by Dr. Eliot Phillipson, physician-in-chief at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"We must report to the Ministry of Transportation any cases of serious apnea and they must stop driving," he said.

"Snoring is a cause for concern," he said. "It used to be thought of as a nuisance, but it may be a sign of underlying disease."

He reported that a mechanical device to increase nasal air flow is "very effective" in 80 to 85 per cent of cases, while surgery is effective in only 50 per cent. "I would rather treat the patient non-surgically," Dr. Phillipson said.

The nasal devices, which are not noisy, are particularly popular with spouses who say their partners are snoring, he said.

Apnea is an extremely common problem (one in 10) among the 65 to 80 age group, with excessive daytime sleepiness the most frequent symptom, he said. On the other hand, it occurs in only two to four per cent of those age 30 to 60.

Other symptoms of apnea are recurrent nocturnal awakening, unrefreshing sleep and cognitive impairment.

Apnea is common in fat people, with 75 per cent of sufferers being overweight, and for them alcohol can be a devastating factor, just enough to tip them over the line. "My advice is to tell such patients, if you have to drink, drink at breakfast, not dinner," he said.

Thornhill Village Estates: Another chapter in The Vogue Development Group's success story

The life of Morris Greenbaum, founder of The Vogue Development Group, is a true North American success story. Orphaned by the Holocaust, and hidden by a Polish farmer during the last year of the war, Morris came to Halifax as a teenager in 1948. Soon after, he married his wife Helen, with whom he had survived the war, and found work in Toronto's garment industry.

In 1955, he made his first modest investment with a friend in the building industry; and in 1957 he founded Green Construction, and built 7 homes in the Bayview-Sheppard area.

Since then, except for an interlude from 1959 to the mid-'60s, Morris has been a builder and developer. He has ridden out the ups and downs in the industry; and his staying power has been rewarded with success.

His sons Lou and Garry have made the building industry a family tradition. In 1990, with 16 years experience in planning and development, Lou joined his father and brother to found The Vogue Development Group, which builds upscale houses throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

Father and sons work well as partners, each contributing his own special knowledge and decades of experience. "I look after development and administration," says Lou; "my brother Garry looks after residential construction; and my father looks after whatever he wants to look after."

Lou is also a spokesman for his industry. In 1982-83, he was Ontario president of the Urban Development Institute, and in 1984, national president. He is still an active member of the board of directors and the executive committee.

The Greenbaums have worked in Thornhill for 20 years, and know the community well. They also have a long record of participation in the community, and are sensitive to the home needs of observant families (for example, separate meat and dairy kitchen facilities).

Vogue specializes in custom or custom-quality detached homes for the move-up market. "No one we build for," says Lou, "has to have exactly the same home as anyone else." Vogue will customize the outside of your home as well as the inside, to create a unique home environment.

To ensure that Vogue meets the demands of the clients, the Greenbaums work closely with them. If you purchase a home from Vogue, you can meet with the architect, and are consulted at every stage of building and finishing.

Some of the tradespeople the Greenbaums employ have worked with them for over 25 years. They are masters of their trades, who maintain the high standards of workmanship Vogue requires. The ultimate proof of this is that after sales, repairs on a home built by Vogue are kept to a minimum.

"People are more demanding these days," Lou admits; "but with most of our business coming from referrals, from the friends and families of home buyers, we are meeting these demands."

Currently, Vogue Developments is building Thornhill Village Estates, on Vaughan Blvd. in the Wilshire Neighbourhood of Thornhill. This site is surrounded by a well-established existing community. Shopping, schools, buses and parks are within easy access; Centre St. and the Promenade are only minutes away.

Thornhill Village Estates offers 36 homes on lots with 45- to 50-ft. frontages, with depths of up to 167 ft.; some of the lots are adjacent to a park. Home sizes range from 3,200 to 4,400 sq. ft.; prices are from $399,900.00 up.

Every home in Thornhill Village Estates includes: precast sills, arches and detailing with clay brick; casement windows; 9' main floor ceilings; circular oak staircases to basement; gas fireplace; upgraded wood trim and brass hardware on doorways and windows; French door to library; 5/8" tongue-and-groove spruce subfloor; oak strip floors and plaster cornice mould in living and dining rooms; high-efficiency gas furnace; whirlpool tub in master ensuite; and gourmet kitchen with island and breakfast bar.

There are 6 different basic designs. Differences in elevation, as well as the many custom details available, ensure that your home will be unique. These details include cathedral ceilings, coffered ceilings, soaring 2-storey inner spaces, columns, art niches and extra large windows.

Come and visit The Vogue Development Group's on-site model home, at the Thornhill Village Estates sales office: Lot 12, Forest Lane Drive. Take Centre St. west from Bathurst to Concord Rd.; go north on Concord to Forest Lane. The Sales Office is open from 12 noon to 6 p.m. on weekends and by appointment only during the week. For information call 905-709-4378.

The best in marble, granite, slate — and glasstile

Bluemar is a new name; but Bluemar's three partners, Piero Gualandris, Mike Carabetta and Kuong Som, have years of experience designing and customizing granite, marble and slate products. "Our work," says Piero, "consists in searching and supplying the best marbles, granites and slates on the market, in tile format or cut-to-size custom-made shapes, for both commercial and residential projects."

Among Bluemar's projects are: the Akasaka Japanese Restaurant at 280 West Beaver Creek Rd., The Ambassador Chinese Cuisine in Jubilee Square; many fine homes and condominium suites; and most notably, the rare marbles and granites in the elegant Golden Times Restaurant in Times Square Mall.

Recently, Bluemar has secured exclusive Eastern Canada distribution rights for a fine line of glasstiles manufactured by Interstyle of Vancouver — a fully Canadian product. Bluemar has a complete stock, and deliveries from Vancouver arrive twice a month. Glasstiles can be used on their own, or as a striking contrast with ceramic tiles.

"You can rely on us," says Piero, "for punctuality, attention to detail, and competitive prices." Visit Bluemar's showroom at 133 Applewood Cres., Units 6-8, in Concord, north of Hwy. #7 off Jane. For more information, call 905-761-7666, or fax 905-761-7667.

Mirrors enhance living space!

For years, decorators have been utilizing mirrors to enhance all sorts of homes, from the largest of mansions, to the smallest of apartments. Mirrors compensate for a lack of natural light, and visually enlarge and enhance any room. Installed in strategic locations, mirrors can give the illusion of a continuing hallway, grand dining room, bright foyer, and spacious bathroom. Mirrors offer an inexpensive and elegant alternative to major renovations, and lends itself to any decorating style.

Closet doors provide an ideal location to utilize mirrors. You can change your old doors to sleek and clean mirror doors. They are practical, functional, effective, and most of all inexpensive.

Marlin Mirror, a family owned and operated firm, has been proudly serving the Jewish community since 1975, and has become synonymous with quality and service. Our helpful and friendly staff can look after all of your mirror needs right in your own home with a no obligation design consultation, or drop in to our showroom at 2600 John St., Unit #110, to get some ideas. We also carry a large selection of bath and shower doors. If you're thinking of utilizing mirrors, then use the best ... use Marlin.

One-of-a-kind in fine furniture

Manny and Joseph Cabral opened Carrocel Restorations in the early '80's. Carrocel specializes in restoring, finishing, building and selling antique and formal furniture, in styles which have stood the test of time: Hepplewhite, Chippendale, Duncan Phyfe, Louis XV and Queen Anne.

"Building and restoring heirlooms is an investment," says Joseph. Because it is also an exacting craft, Manny and Joseph make a point of being present at every stage of the work. As everything they make or restore is hand-crafted, they work closely with designers, interior decorators, cabinetmakers and carvers.

Carrocel offers full furniture restoration, custom building, finishing and upholstering. To meet your needs, they will build in a period style, or to match something you already have--whether it's a custom table to seat 12 or more at family gatherings like Seders, or matching chairs to complete a set.

Carrocel has baby grands, secretary tables, occasional tables, desks, sofas, china cabinets and buffets on hand for sale, along with a large selection of other antique and fine furniture. Any piece can be custom-finished or altered according to your wishes.

Carrocel Restorations is at 3115 14th Ave., Unit #4, in Markham near Woodbine and Steeles. For information call (905) 475-6942.

Once a showroom for the design trade only, Dover Imports recently opened its doors to welcome the general public with year-round discounted prices on all merchandise. From floor to ceiling, a vast array of gifts and decorative accessories offer something for every taste and price range. Exotic screens, sculptures, jades, bronzes, chests and tables, new and antique porcelain vases, jars and planters have been selected to provide that touch of classic sophistication to any decor. Custom wrought iron furniture is also available at great prices. Shoppers are encouraged to browse leisurely through Dover's 8,000 sq. ft. warehouse and make use of the friendly and knowledgeable assistance on hand when making their selections.

For 25 years designers relied on Eleanor Dover's and her daughter Nancy's expertise and good taste when seeking out unique and unusual artifacts from the Far East. With Eleanor's retirement in January, Dover Imports changed hands, but not its philosophy. The new mother and daughter team of Gella Rothstein and Debbie Rothstein Friedman are committed to maintaining the same sense of wondrous discovery that has become synonymous with the name Dover Imports. Already, new and exciting items are arriving to enrich this storehouse of distinctive design accessories.

Exchange program unites medical experts

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —It started in 1984 as an exchange program between doctors in Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital Department of Otolaryngology and their colleagues in Israel.

CISEPO, the Isabel Silverman Canadian International Scientific Exchange Program, now involves medical experts from Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands, Norway, Turkey, Brazil and most recently, Jordan. It includes such disciplines as behavioral neurology, public health, dentistry, ophthalmology, cancer research and biomedical computer technology.

It has also expanded in Canada to include the Sir Mortimer B. David Jewish General Hospital in Montreal, Dr. Arnold Noyek, otolaryngologist-in-chief at Mt. Sinai and executive director of CISEPO told The CJN in a recent interview.

"The CISEPO vision is to promote advances in health care by fostering excellence in research and education through scientific exchange," Noyek said.

Major symposia have recently included one on nasal surgery, in which physicians from Canada, Israel and New Zealand participated; and one on breathing problems in the upper airway with medical specialists from Canada, Israel and Brazil.

Mt. Sinai's Dr. Jeremy Freeman is doing research on the nasopharynx, the area in the back of the nose. His work will help members of the Chinese community who, Noyek said, often suffer from certain problems there. The research is being done in conjunction with similar work in southern China and the Mediterranean.

These multidisciplinary and multinational efforts are especially valuable because of what Noyek calls "genomic geography," that is, the fact that certain genetic features show up in populations which are spread very far apart yet obviously have a common relationship.

One area of research that is seen to have major implications all over the world is REMSEN, Remote Sensing for Medical Services and Research Projects.

This involves a direct, interactive, multimedia communication link based on teleconferencing software, regular personal computers and phone lines.

Medical examinations and instrumentations are electronically linked to the computer, so that X-ray images, hearing and eye tests, dental assessments or neurological evaluations can be transmitted over long distances.

This is particularly helpful, Noyek noted, in developing countries, where, for instance, the medical facilities are in the big cities, but most of the population live in the hinterlands.

It is even significant in Ontario, where some of the problems of small communities with no doctors could be obviated by REMSEN, with a nurse practitioner wielding the examination instruments.

This month, CISEPO is involved in a conference in Jerusalem on tumors of the base of the skull, organized by Dr. Dan Fliss of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, and another one at the Hadassah Medical Centre, which will discuss research on balance, conducted by Soviet olim.

Noyek is especially excited about a third conference in Amman in early March invoving Israel, Canada and Jordan, on the subject of Contemporary Otolaryngology in the Middle East. Dr. Raffi Feinmesser of the Beilinson Medical Centre is organizing that conference and Dr. Sol Frenkiel, of the Sir Mortimer Davis Jewish General Hospital will be taking part.

Other Toronto doctors involved with CISEPO include John Rutka, Edward Kassel, Jerry Chapnik, Ian Witterick, Jeff Hurwitz and David Mock of Mt. Sinai; and Morris Freedman and Allan Gordon of Baycrest Centre.

Funds for CISEPO come from the Saul Silverman Family Foundation, the Temmy Latner/Dynacare Fund, the Shiff Family Fund, Mt. Sinai Hospital, the University of Toronto and individuals and corporations with special interests in medical research, academic exchange and health care development.

Genetic marker discovered

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hadassah-University Hospital researchers have discovered a genetic marker for hereditary inclusion body myopathy (HIBM), a disease that is most common among Jews of Persian (Iranian) origin.

The finding two weeks ago may lead to the discovery of the actual gene, but it is already a breakthrough because it enables families to determine through genetic counselling who is a possible carrier.

Prof. Zohar Argov, a senior neurologist at the hospital in Ein Kerem, Jerusalem, said the disease occurs in one out of every 1,500 Jews of Persian origin. There are about 80 Israelis who have been diagnosed with the disease, but "we believe others remain undiagnosed, apparently because they are ashamed. We'd like to find them," he said.

Other ethnic groups, both Jewish and non-Jewish, suffer from the same or similar types of inherited muscular dystrophy, but with a lower frequency.

Discovered in late '70s

Argov discovered the disease in the late '70s and has searched for the genetic marker for the past 15 months.

HIBM is characterized by the appearance of progressive weakness when the patient is in his or her 20s; it causes difficulties in walking and using the hands. Patients don't die of it, but some are very disabled due to extensive muscle damage. Until now, the disease was only detectable when the patient became ill.

Molecular genetic research, conducted by Argov with Dr. Stella Rosenbaum of the unit of molecular genetic development at Hadassah-University Hospital on Mt. Scopus, led to the discovery of the genetic marker in all the patients examined. They discovered that the defective gene is located somewhere on Chromosome #9 and now want to find the exact location.

Families with a member who has been diagnosed with the disease are asked to contact Argov at (02) 776938.

Cancer programs combined

TORONTO — The Board of Trustees of the Ontario Cancer Institute/Princess Margaret Hospital and the Toronto Hospital recently agreed to consolidate their oncology programs.

The new joint oncology program will consolidate all the programs at Princess Margaret Hospital with all those at the Toronto Hospital, under single medical leadership and single management leadership.

Each hospital will retain its own governance chaired by Peter A. Crossgrove at Princess Margaret Hospital and Fredrik S. Eaton at the Toronto Hospital.

The consolidation will enable both hospitals to rationalize all of their respective support services with the objectives of: saving millions of dollars that can be reinvested in providing cancer care to Ontario residents; creating a seamless oncology program between the two hospitals; aggregating the resources devoted to cancer care, teaching and research.

Israelis voice concerns over terms of free trade

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Prime Minister Shimon Peres is expected to sign a Canada-Israel free trade agreement (FTA) during his visit to Canada in March. But a leading Israeli industrialist has warned that certain provisions in the accord will severely harm Israel's trade relations with the United States.

Dan Propper, president of the Manufacturers Association of Israel, told an Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce meeting last week that stipulations in the agreement could jeopardize Israel's $10 billion trade with the United States.

Canadian and Israeli trade negotiators concluded the proposed FTA last month, but must resolve several minor issues before the agreement can be signed.

Propper said the widespread expectation that Peres will sign the FTA during his March visit has weakened Israel's bargaining position on these unresolved points. "No one can negotiate successfully when he is told he must finish by a certain date. It is like having a sword of Damocles hanging over his neck," he said.

Propper expressed concern over the customs classification system to be used in the agreement. Israel would like to adopt the same system that is the basis of its FTA with the United States — a demand rejected by Canada. "The change Canada wants could result in profound damage to certain Israeli industries that export to the United States," said Propper. "We will lose the advantage we have in our trade agreement with the United States, which is our largest North American trading partner," he warned. He cited several other unresolved points in the agreement, which he said "could affect entire industries. But it will be very hard to win on these points when there is such pressure to sign."

However, Propper expressed enthusiasm for the principle of a free trade agreement with Canada and urged Israeli industrialists to examine opportunities in Canada. "The Canadian market may be smaller than that of the United States, but it is a less competitive market and one worth investing in," he said.

In 1995 Canada-Israel trade amounted to approximately $330 million. Israel's trade with the United States totals close to $10 billion a year. "Simple arithmetic suggests that Israel should be able to reach a $1 billion balance of trade with Canada once the FTA is signed," said Yehuda Raveh, president of the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce.

During the chamber of commerce meeting, Raveh read a letter from Peres to Canadian Ambassador to Israel David Berger in which the prime minister expressed his "hope" that the free trade agreement "will be brought to a positive conclusion" during his upcoming visit to Canada. Peres also praised Canada's decision to drop the embargo on military trade with Israel that has been in effect since the 1967 Six Day War.

Both Raveh and Propper said they hoped the FTA would lead to a more equal trade relationship between the two countries. Canada exports more to Israel than it imports, according to Israeli officials.

Raveh also said that the peace process had created new opportunities for Canadian involvement in mammoth regional development projects, such as construction of railways, pipelines and highways.

Jerusalem partition discounted

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Sensitivity to the idea of informal discussions about Jerusalem has been significantly heightened because of the similar discussions that led to the Oslo agreement.

Regardless of whether talks are now being held, it remains far from certain that Jerusalem, as it has evolved since 1967, can be repartitioned.

Meron Benvenisti, a former deputy mayor and a leading researcher on the city, declared Sunday that partition is no longer feasible.

For Palestinians, Benvenisti said, there is already the start of a "functional division of the city. The Palestinians living in Jerusalem are essentially part of the Palestinian Authority's educational system. I think it is only a matter of time before Palestinians living in the city have Palestinian passports, as their Jordanian passports will be withdrawn."

But Dr. Dore Gold, who just concluded a study on Jerusalem for Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, said he does not believe the Palestinians will be satisfied with the borough arrangements.

Peres, cabinet ministers received death threats

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Shimon Peres and other ministers have received death threats, the cabinet was told last week.

Cabinet sources said threats were made against Peres, Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal, and Environment Minister Yossi Sarid.

According to a security source, there are "hundreds" of people who would like to kill Peres.

In a rare interview with a member of his family, Peres's daughter Zvia Walden, a university lecturer, told Israel Radio Sunday that she had received death threats against her father and herself. "There are threats against the prime minister ... People who oppose him are losing their minds. I think they feel the moment of truth is coming, and the solution he strove for over many years is finally becoming a reality.

"I am also a target for those who find no other outlet but to issue despicable threats," she said.

According to cabinet sources, Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer warned that another assassination is possible, and everyone should be vigilant. It was Ben-Eliezer who warned the cabinet a week before Rabin's assassination that a political killing was a very real possibility.

At that meeting, Ben-Eliezer appealed to Rabin to ban guns at political demonstrations, to minimize the risks of an assassination. Rabin, however, turned the appeal aside, saying it was unworkable.

Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish voiced concern that the likelihood of another killing has only increased now that the Likud has falsely charged that Labor is going to redivide Jerusalem.

Interior Minister Haim Ramon urged that the police act against right-wing activist Avigdor Eskin, who allegedly held up a placard in Jerusalem proclaiming "Yigal Amir is not a murderer."

"If this is not sedition, I do not know what is," he said.

38 YEARS OF SUCCESS

Israel, Syria at odds over a final border

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Israel's current peace negotiations with Syria, which are due to resume at the Wye Plantations Conference Centre in Maryland for a third round on Feb. 26, turn on a number of complex issues running the gamut from security arrangements to water resources.

Perhaps the most complicated one is where the permanent border should be fixed in the context of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Syria's policy is clear. Israel must return to the frontier of June 4, 1967. Israel has rejected this demand, countering it might consider a withdrawal to the 1923 international boundary.

In territorial terms, there is a difference of only about 21 square miles between the international boundary — which was drawn by France and Britain during their heyday as Middle Eastern colonial powers — and the pre-Six Day War line.

The contested area, which Israel captured in the Six Day War, contains the sources of the upper Jordan River — streams such as the Hatzbani, the Banias and the Dan — and the northeastern tip of the Sea of Galilee. In an arid region like the Middle East, this is no trifling matter. As Prime Minister Shimon Peres recently put it: "Water to a country is like weapons to an army."

Syria considers the international border an artificial imperialist creation and thus an affront to Arab nationalism and pride, while Israel views it as perfectly legitimate.

Following its declaration of statehood in May 1948, six Arab armies, including Syria's, invaded Israel. In the main, the Israelis repulsed the Syrians. But the Syrians managed to gain ground west of the international boundary.

On July 20, 1949, Syria and Israel signed an armistice agreement. It established demilitarized zones (DMZs) between the international boundary and the ceasefire lines. Israel and Syria were supposed to vacate the DMZs in three stages over a 12-week period.

Since the planned pullouts from the DMZs never happened, tensions flared in the early 1950s.

Syria challenged Israel's decision to drain the Hula swamp and to expel some 600 Arab civilians from DMZ. Israel protested Syria's seizure of territory which, the armistice agreement attested, belonged to the Jewish state.

The Syrian land grab encompassed a strip approximately 10 metres from the northeast shore of the Sea of Galilee, the east bank of the Jordan River from the Sea of Galilee to the Hula Valley, a portion of the northern sector of the DMZ east of Kibbutz Dan and bits on the Golan Heights (notably al-Hamma, Hirbet Tawfiq and Nuqeib.)

The military confrontation over the DMZ temporarily died down in May 1951, when Israel and Syria concluded they had nothing further to gain from further violence, according to Aryeh Shalev in The Israel-Syria Armistice Regime 1949-1955, published by the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

In a bid to resolve their differences, Israel and Syria entered into negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations. These talks ran from October 1952 to May 1953.

Syria demanded that a new border be moved westward — through Lake Hula, the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan River — at Israel's expense.

Israel's response was negative. Israel was particularly incensed by the fact that Syria continued to occupy that 10-metre strip adjacent to the northern part of the Sea of Galilee, which was internationally recognized as Israeli territory.

As a result of this sharp disagreement, the already tense situation on the Sea of Galilee grew worse.(In December 1951, Syrian gunners on the Golan had killed two Israeli fishermen.)

At the end of 1953, the Syrians launched a systematic campaign of violating the armistice agreement and Israeli sovereignty — fishing extensively on the Sea of Galilee and shelling Israeli boats, especially police patrol vessels.

In 1954, the Israelis decided to confront the Syrians by preventing Syrian fishing and by intensifying patrols near the northeastern shore. By way of retaliation, Syria encouraged fishing by its nationals and fired at Israeli craft in the vicinity of the disputed northeastern extremity of the Sea of Galliee. This, in turn, prompted Israel to strike at Syrian emplacements close to the lake.

From Israel's vantage point, the struggle for the northeast corner of the Sea of Galilee was resolved when the Israeli armed forces captured the Golan Heights during the Six Day War. Israel then declared the 1949 armistice agreement null and void.

Syria, however, maintains that the accord is still valid, and demands the return of land won by Israel in 1967. Damascus' claims are one more reason why the Syrians and the Israelis are so profoundly at odds over the placement of a final border.

Histradrut paper saved as funding restored

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Davar Rishon, which was to close last Thursday, was saved at the last moment by what many in the newspaper and the Histadrut called a "miracle."

In a dramatic decision, the Histadrut last Thursday revoked its earlier decision to close the paper and announced that it would resume its financial support, thus enabling publication to continue.

The impetus was provided by the Singer-Barnea group, which undertook to get together some 30 investors for the long-term project of managing Davar Rishon.

Editor-in-chief Ron Ben-Yishai said the group "will invest not only money but know-how and commercial ability. The offer comes from the altruistic motive to help the newspaper."

Histadrut chair Amir Peretz said the Histadrut would be a minor partner in the project. "We decided to give this historic newspaper a chance. It's important for us that the social voice, the mouthpiece of the workers, continues to be heard."

The announcement caught Davar Rishon editors and journalists by surprise as they were preparing what was to be the final edition.

"We're afraid of getting our hopes up again," one journalist said. "This might all turn out to be too good to be true."

Peretz said the Barnea-Singer company undertook to set up a group of investors who will put $250,000 into Davar Rishon within a week, while the Histadrut will match the sum. In addition, the Histadrut will continue giving the paper $1 million a year for the next two years.

Senior Davar Rishon sources said contacts with several potential investors, including the Singer-Barnea group, had been under way over the past months, but the Histadrut's decision to cut off the paper's financial pipeline had made it impossible for them to succeed.

"It is more likely that due to public pressure, the Histadrut was searching for a ladder to climb down from the limb and change its decision to close Davar Rishon," one source said.

"This way it has a good excuse to resume financial support to the newspaper at least until after election year," he said.

Leading settlement rabbi opposes anti-Peres campaign

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza made a mistake in publicly endorsing Benjamin Netanyahu, and would make an even greater mistake if it launched personal attacks on Shimon Peres, said Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun, the renegade member of the council's executive, last week.

"I am against negative personal campaigns," Rabbi Bin-Nun said. "I have seen two such campaigns, one against Menachem Begin and one against Yitzhak Rabin, and I am not prepared for this to happen again."

Rabbi Bin-Nun was responding to reports about a document that allegedly details plans for the settlement council to lead a smear campaign against Peres. The council has denied that such a document exists, or that attacking Peres personally is its strategy.

Rabbi Bin-Nun said he doesn't know if such a document exists. He said, however, that the council in the past decided to wage a personal campaign against Rabin. Uri Ariel, head of the council, denied this.

According to Rabbi Bin-Nun, the settlement movement is shooting itself in the foot by publicly and actively supporting Netanyahu.

"What will happen if Peres wins? This is a very irresponsible move," he said.

Rabbi Bin-Nun caused a furor five days after Rabin's assassination when he announced that he knew of rabbis who gave halachic support for the killing. Police investigated a number of rabbis, but nothing came of the accusations.

Ariel rejected Rabbi Bin-Nun's position, saying the council has legitimate criticism of the government's polices.

"What are we supposed to do, say amen to every move the government makes because of a fear that if we don't, they will get back at us later? We will do what we can to ensure the victory of the national camp, and if a Peres government intends to take out its vengeance on us, then that is a scandal," Ariel said.

Amir trial postoned three weeks

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Tel Aviv District Court agreed to a three-week recess in the trial of Yigal Amir for the murder of Yitzhak Rabin.

The recess was called last week to allow the 25-year-old to undergo additional psychiatric examinations.

Defence attorneys have so far resisted an insanity plea, but Amir did agree to undergo an initial psychiatric evaluation earlier this month at the court's request.

One of Amir's court-appointed attorneys, Shmuel Fleishman, has said that the defence is considering arguing that Amir was not in emotional control of himself during the assassination. Such an argument could reduce the charges against him and bring a shorter sentence.

Under the Israeli criminal code, a defendant convicted of murder can get less than a life sentence if it is proven that he suffered from emotional problems at the time of committing the crime.

Buchanan's early success concerns Jewish Republicans

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – Stung by Pat Buchanan's strong early showing in the race for the Republican presidential nomination, Jewish Republicans will continue to distance themselves from the man many consider a borderline anti-Semite.

Boosted by a second-place "victory" in last week's Iowa caucus and by last week's upset in the Louisiana caucus, Buchanan has emerged as the early choice of the religious right for the GOP nomination.

While a Buchanan nomination remains a long shot, his strong showing early in the race has moderate Republicans rushing to loudly denounce him.

"Pat Buchanan has a very strong hate message and message of class warfare and unfortunately, a number of Republican Iowans bought it," said Bud Hockenberg, a Jewish Republican activist in Des Moines. "Pat Buchanan poses a grave danger for the Jewish community."

Matt Brooks, executive director of the National Jewish Coalition, the pre-eminent Jewish Republican organization, said, "Pat Buchanan's views are so far out of the mainstream of the Republican party today that they are practically out of the Republican tent.

"He is a rather large nuisance, like a little dog who is constantly barking at your heels," Brooks said.

Fearing that there will be a repeat of the 1992 convention debacle, when the party appeared intolerant and exclusive, Republicans pledged this year to keep the GOP's far right wing in check.

The candidates begin a five-week sprint through 30 states this week that will likely decide who will represent the GOP in the November elections.

Buchanan has championed a socially conservative platform with an emphasis on policy goals advocated by the religious right. He has promised to propose a constitutional amendment to outlaw all abortions in the United States, to take steps to end immigration and to bring prayer into the nation's public schools. In his current campaign, Buchanan has stayed away from the fiery rhetoric that led American Jewish Committee's Kenneth Stern in a 1991 report to describe him as a man who is "no friend to the Jews and has serious problems with 'Jewish issues.'"

Buchanan has drawn the ire of the Jewish community for criticizing U.S. foreign aid to Israel as "subsidizing a policy that denies to Palestinians that God-given right to a homeland" and accusing Israel and its "amen corner" in the United States of leading the charge for the 1991 Gulf War.

Buchanan has riled the Jewish community in particular for his defence of accused Nazi war criminals and support for views espoused by Holocaust deniers.

He has questioned the number of Jews gassed at Treblinka and accused survivors of having a syndrome of "group fantasies of martyrdom and heroics."

He was particularly active in the defence of John Demjanjuk, an SS guard acquitted by the Israeli Supreme Court of being Ivan the Terrible. Nonetheless, the court found credible evidence that he committed crimes against humanity.

While most of the Jewish community remains on the sidelines watching the Buchanan campaign, at least one group has been actively protesting his candidacy.

"Pat Buchanan is the most dangerous anti-Semite in America today," said Ronn Torrosian, national spokesperson for the Coalition for Jewish Concerns (AMCHA).

'Conspiracy mongering'

By THOMAS O'DWYER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Anti-Defamation League has protested to presidential hopeful Pat Buchanan about "fantastical and highly offensive anti-Israel conspiracy mongering" in an article on the Buchanan campaign's official Internet site.

The article, in a series titled "Other News You Might Have Missed," blames the Mossad for the death of Vince Foster, a former close aide of President Bill Clinton. The article charges Hillary Clinton with being a Mossad agent.

Attention is being drawn to the article by another Internet site, the Jewish Communications Network (JCN), which is monitoring the U.S. presidential race from a Jewish perspective.

"This will only fuel the American Jewish community's distrust of Buchanan," says editor Larry Yudelson on the JCN site.

The JCN says that while Buchanan cannot be personally held responsible for the unsigned article, it is still on the official campaign site and reflects some of the attitudes of people that ally themselves with Buchanan.

Israeli campaign turns nasty knowledge whatsoever of any official persons dealing with Jerusalem or conducting negotiations on this issue.

"Reports of this are baseless. The prime minister emphasized that the entire cabinet is united on the principle that Jerusalem should not be divided, and allegations to the contrary should be considered incitement."

Olmert cited two recent meetings between Pundak and Hirschfeld and Palestinian officials in Jerusalem. The first was in November at Orient House and the second at the Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs.

The upcoming elections will be a referendum on Jerusalem, Netanyahu said, launching the Likud-Tsomet campaign with posters and stickers bearing the slogan, "Peres will divide Jerusalem."

"If the prime minister means what he told the cabinet, he should prove it by closing down Orient House by March 1," Olmert said.

According to the government's own evaluations, he added, closing Orient House would not affect the continuation of the peace process.

Both Netanyahu and Olmert rejected a call by Labor Party secretary-general Nissim Zvilli to sign an agreement to keep the Jerusalem issue out of the election campaign.

Netanyahu dismissed the demand as "ridiculous." "Jerusalem is the most important issue in these elections. We won't agree to keep quiet now, so that he can yield later. The elections will determine whether the Jewish dream of a united, rebuilt Jerusalem will continue or disintegrate."

Channel 2 reported that Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal called on Foreign Minister Ehud Barak to prevent foreign dignitaries from visiting Orient House.

Netanyahu gave a long list of reasons for concern about Jerusalem, including the talks on the permanent status; the secret talks in Europe; the existence of more than 10 Palestinian offices operating in Jerusalem; the plans for an Arab shadow municipality; the presence of Rajoub Jibril's Preventive Security Service agents; Yasser Arafat's declarations on the the city; the Palestinian elections in the city; and the government's refusal to support opposition bills calling for a special Knesset majority to endorse changes to Jerusalem's borders and status.

MK Yitzhak Levy (National Religious Party), meanwhile, said he would raise his Jerusalem bill for first reading this week. Under the bill, any changes to the existing Jerusalem Law would require a majority of 80 MKs, two-thirds of the Knesset. "The bill is compatible with the government's statements on the status of Jerusalem and will be a test of the honesty of those statements," Levy said.

A similar bill has been submitted by Likud MK Uzi Landau.

Judaism gets a boost from Internet project

By LESLIE KATZ
Jewish Telegraphic Agency and the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO - Classes on Maimonides or the application of Halachah to daily life are not exactly easy to find for Jews in, say, Hong Kong or remote areas of the Pacific Northwest.

But in cyberspace, those classes and others of Jewish interest are available to anyone with a modem, a telephone line and an Internet connection.

Rabbi Ya'akov Menken founded and maintains Project Genesis: Torah on the Information Superhighway, a Jewish learning centre on the Internet offering classes on Jewish philosophy and practice as well as Jewish archives, Torah commentaries and general information about happenings in the Jewish world.

The 30-something Orthodox rabbi, who holds an engineering degree from Princeton University, operates Project Genesis from his home office in Spring Valley, N.Y.

Currently, there are more than 10 interpretations of the weekly Torah portion available on the Internet. Four are available through Project Genesis, as is one interpretation of the Haftarah.

The privately funded project started in 1993 with a single class exploring a specific work on Jewish ethics. Since then, it has expanded to become the largest Jewish learning centre in the cyberworld, with more than a dozen classes and about 5,000 students downloading class material. Subscribers come from as far away as Sweden, Norway, Argentina and Brazil.

Last year, Project Genesis expanded further by opening a World Wide Web site – http://www.torah.org – that is a resource for the project's services.

The icon labelled Special Speakers, Seminars and Events, for example, leads to a listing of events, including the International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics.

Another icon, labelled Other Jewish Learning Programs, offers information on Jewish learning centres around the world, and links visitors to other Internet sites of Jewish interest.

If users click on the icon for Global Learning Network, meanwhile, they can get a description of the various free classes offered through Project Genesis, and can register for them.

In some cases, material covered by a class is available for perusal and downloading.

Rabbis teaching the classes are all Orthodox, but Rabbi Menken insists that the program is non-denominational. Surveys of subscribers, he says, show that they belong to all branches of Judaism.

The point "is not to tell people how to observe or what to do, but to offer them the necessary background," he says. "A well-informed Reform or Conservative Jew also should know these things."

Parties discuss union

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Meimad, which decided late last week to register as a political party, was to begin exploratory talks with The Third Way, David Levy's list and Natan Sharansky's Yisrael B'aliya about the possibility of forming a centrist bloc, said Yehuda Ben-Meir, one of the movement's leaders.

The movement also decided at its meeting to call on its supporters to vote for Shimon Peres in the race for prime minister.

Avigdor Kahalani, head of the Third Way, said this decision will "make it more difficult" for his party and Meimad to run together.

Ben-Meir said that despite Kahalani's comment, contacts with The Third Way will continue. "The country doesn't like small parties," he said. "I don't believe there is a future for small parties."

The party's executive decided to register as a party but did not make any formal decision whether Meimad will run alone, with other parties or if it will even run at all. "We want to keep the options open," Ben-Meir said, adding that Meimad would have "no problem" running with other, non-religious parties.

The decision to support Peres, Ben-Meir said, was due in no small part to the support for Benjamin Netanyahu by the National Religious Party and the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

"I do not think we would have come out in favor of Peres had it not been that the National Religious Party and settlement council clearly support Netanyahu" Ben-Meir said. "We don't want the impression to exist that everyone religious is on one side and against the other half of the country. The whole religious community is not on one side."

Ben-Meir said that Meimad backed Peres because "he supports the peace process and Oslo. The prime minister race is a clear cut decision between two different approaches. Netanyahu said he has to accept reality, but we see it [the Oslo accords] as more than that. We see it as an opportunity, but with a heavy price."

At the same time, Ben-Meir said, Meimad has differences with the Labor party's left which preclude it from supporting that party.

Playwright's Retreat sure to stir up lots of controversy

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rachel, a young Hebrew school teacher in Toronto who faces suspension because she compared Israeli settlers to terrorists, is one of four Jewish characters in Retreat by controversial playwright Jason Sherman.

Before Retreat ends, and before Rachel decides to quit or apologize, she goes to a writers' retreat in the Rockies and has an affair with David, a film producer. David disagrees with Rachel's ideas for a screenplay contending that Israel has lost its idealism.

Retreat opens at Tarragon Theatre's mainstage Feb. 20 and runs to March 17. Previews began Feb. 14 (531-1827).

"This is not a play driven by politics. It's driven by two people having an affair," Sherman says. "It's not meant to offend anyone who has particular ideas about Israel and I have no idea whether it will. If it's disturbing, that wouldn't be bad. I want people to question their own assumptions.

"It's commenting on larger issues. For example, can you understand the complicated situation in Israel if you can't understand the person sitting across the table from you?"

Rachel's screenplay is about Shabbetai Zevi, the 17th century mystic who announced that he was the Messiah and then confounded his fervent followers by converting to Islam in the face of a death threat by the Sultan of Constantinople. Rachel sees Zevi's life as an allegory for the history of State of Israel.

Sherman, 33, who won the Governor General's drama award in 1995 for Three in the Back, Two in the Head has now written four plays in which Israeli politics figure. He is working on a CBC drama about a Palestinian arrested in Canada as a suspected terrorist, and the battle over his extradition.

One of Sherman's earlier plays, League of Nathans is now on stage in Winnipeg (Winnipeg Jewish Theatre) and earning good reviews. His stage adaptation of None is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper is set to be co-produced by the Winnipeg troupe in May 1997. Reading Hebron, about Baruch Goldstein's killing of Arabs praying in a mosque is to be developed at Playwrights Workshop, Montreal.

Lithos warm up wintery day

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Outside it is winter, but inside the Circle Gallery on Hazelton Avenue, Calman Shemi's laser wall sculptures, soft paintings and limited edition lithographs in hot pinks, reds, yellows, clear blues, greens and purples, bring warmth.

The comprehensive exhibition, which was opened by Jehudi Kinar, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, continues through Feb. 29.

Born in Mendoza, "a beautiful place in Argentina's Atlas Mountains," Shemi skipped high school and at 13, entered the School of Sculpture and Ceramics, which was affiliated with the city's university. With singular purpose, he convinced the institute's director that it would be a waste of time to delay his study of art. The youngest pupil ever, he remained at the school four years.

Later, in Buenos Aires, he was equally persuasive when the country's foremost sculptor, who never gave lessons, agreed that Shemi could work on his own and bring in his sculpture for monitoring by the master.

After making aliyah at 21, Shemi lived on Kibbutz Carmia, between Ashkelon and Gaza for 20 years.

"It was an open kibbutz," he says. "They gave me a small room where I could do my work at night. Through the day, I worked in the fields."

In 1977, he developed the process for his soft paintings. Using a threadless 9,000-needle industrial machine, the property of the kibbutz, he fuses fine felt fabric into exhilarating concepts alive with color and form. The method enables him to create textures ranging from diaphanous to opaque.

Though his studio is now in Jerusalem, Shemi returns regularly to Carmia.

Nature is a pervasive influence in his work. In his painting, Shimmering Sails, a translucent sailboat is in front of a series of small dots, his vocabulary for an orchard. Tree of Life could be any tree — in a field, in a forest, anywhere.

Shemi's laser wall sculptures, which are cut from steel and layered with automobile paint for endurance, appear amazingly buoyant.

Shemi has exhibited in noted galleries worldwide and his works are found in public, corporate and private collections.

In 1977, Israel's president Ephraim Katzir presented a Shemi painting to Egypt's President Anwar al-Sadat. It was representational — a dove against a blue and green background for the Israeli and Egyptian flags — to symbolize peace between the two nations.

The recent lithograph, Jerusalem 3,000, commemorates the city's third millenium.

1952 film dramatizes Israel's birth pangs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Touted as the first Hollywood film to be made on location in Israel, Faithful City is a dusty though interesting relic of a bygone age.

Released in 1952 by now-defunct RKO Radio Pictures, Josef Leytes' 86-minute movie is set in 1947, a pivotal year in the modern history of the Middle East.

Faithful City, which will be aired by Vision TV on Feb. 29 at 8 p.m., unfolds against the backdrop of two momentous historic events: the United Nations Palestine partition plan and Britain's decision to give up its mandate there.

But far from being a political film, as these milestones might suggest, Faithful City is rather a human drama, turning on a group of newly-arrived young Jewish refugees settling in at a children's village in Jerusalem.

The kids are fresh from Nazi-occupied Europe and "the gutters of the Orient," a local and inexcusably vulgar and condescending expression for Morocco. They are restless, cynical and on edge, all the more so after their bus is stoned by Arabs on a lonely stretch of road from Haifa to Jerusalem.

At the village, a bucolic spot framed by nearly bare mountains, the children come under the tutelage of two idealistic adults — Ezra (John Slater), an Israeli, and Sam (Jamie Smith), an American.

Though they are torn by differences of approach in resettling their charges, their basic mission is clear. As Ezra puts it, "We must give these kids back their childhood and make them believe in something."

It won't be easy. Unnerved by the stoning, and certain that a war is imminent, some of the kids express a wish to return to Europe.

Futhermore, ethnic tension bubbles to the surface. "What do you know, Moroccan?" one boy taunts a fellow refugee. "Nazi," the North African boy counters.

As we quickly learn, the most problematic youngsters in the camp are Max (Israel Hanin) and Anna (Dina Peskin), both of whom are impertinent, cocky and hostile to Sam.

But in time, as they get to know him better, their antagonism fades. Predictably, their ill feeling toward Sam is supplanted by friendship and admiration.

The film reaches its climax after Sam joins the Haganah and the village, besieged by Arab forces, runs dangerously low of water.

Faithful City, emotionally flat until now, recharges itself in the penultimate, somewhat exciting scene in which Sam takes the controls of a disabled water truck and drives it past explosions, much to the relief of the thirsty villagers.

Prefiguring such Israel-centred blockbuster films as Exodus and Cast a Giant Shadow, Faithful City is a modest, albeit sincere, attempt to dramatize the birth pangs of a nation.

And while it doesn't always succeed, it takes its place as the first major American studio film to try to portray this inspirational and often emulated theme.

'A gentle look at two old friends'

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the Time of Old Ages is a play about two financially challenged 75-year-olds, a Jew and an Irishman, who win $8 million in the 649 lottery.

They outwit a schemer who has devious plans for the money and buy themselves a nursing home in the country where they can retire as benevolent landlords.

Along the way, there are chuckles as both Reuben Ludlow, the Jew, and Mickey Flaherty, the Irishman, decide that children don't always know best.

The play, with Ray Rawlings, who is Jewish, playing Ludlow, is ending its run Feb. 22-24 at the Huron Park Community Theatre in Mississauga.

"It's a play that everyone, especially seniors, can enjoy," said director Ron Ashton. "It's a gentle look at two old friends."

On a visit to his family in Toronto, Flaherty buys a 649 ticket and sends it to Ludlow in New York for his 75th birthday. But the widower fails to open the envelope and it's not until much later that the two friends realize they are the winners.

The theatre is located at 830 Paisley Blvd. W., near the intersection of Mavis Road and Dundas Street. To book tickets, which are $15 ($10 for seniors), call 905-821-0090.

Teenagers write play

TORONTO — The Beth Tzedec Youth Players are presenting Me, Myself and I Feb. 28 at 7 p.m. at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

The actors, aged 7 to 14, wrote the play themselves.It is a teenage perspective on a variety of topics illustrating the experiences of childhood and the beginnings of adolescence.

Proceeds of the production will go to Jewish Family & Child Service. Last year the Beth Tzedec Youth Players raised $700 for the Reena Foundation.

Me, Myself and I is produced and directed by Ruth Rumack and Stacey Wintre. Tickets are $5; $7 at the door. Call 787-0381 ext. 39.

MAMA MIA

One international fast food chain after another is beginning to appear in Israel's town centres. The Italian-style fast food group Sbarro is the latest fast food outlet to come to Israel. Established in downtown Jerusalem, it has the distinction of being the branch's first kosher outlet in the world and is offering its special creation Pizza Yerushalmi. The pizza has a topping of labane, olive oil and black olives. Here, two of the staff proudly display the Pizza Yerushalmi. [Israel photo]

Producer Jordan Schwartz breathes life into Toronto variety show

By JUDY SIBLIN-RAKOFF
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's almost like a party — because of producer Jordan Schwartz.

As the audience files into the studio for the Camilla Scott Show, they are greeted by a set that is alive with a burst of color — purples, oranges and yellows, and then this catchy music comes on, and you can't stop singing the theme song. Everyone is dancing in their seats and the show hasn't even begun.

Schwartz stands at the production table, wearing a headset. Other production staff are present during the taping, but at all times Schwartz is quietly in charge, orchestrating the event.

It takes a certain kind of person to be the supervising producer of a network talk show with a staff of 25 people, but to achieve this by the age of 30 is even more impressive.

Not bad for the kid whose first job in television was doing his own comedy show for Rogers Cable 10 at the age of 14. Ever since, Schwartz has been driven to succeed in this business.

So when the opportunity arose to create a new talk show geared towards teens and 20-somethings, Schwartz was ready. He was also instrumental in finding the perfect star for the show, actress/singer Camilla Scott.

When Schwartz first began in showbusiness, he wanted to be on-air. And he was. Besides his comedy show, he hosted a segment on the Life Channel and worked on air at CBC.

"I got to the point where I was sort of too young to do serious stuff and too old to do teen stuff. The Shirley Show was coming around, and I was at Ryerson in Radio/ Television. I called Shirley because she was at The Life Channel, and I ended up working on her pilot,"and became an audience researcher for the show.

Within one year he became a story producer. "I just loved it. I loved it more than on-air, and that's when my career changed.

"And it was fun writing scripts and finding the people and the stories."

When the show went on hiatus, he was off to Los Angeles and New York looking for other opportunities. He met the producers of the Home Show, Woody Fraser and Marty Tenney. Two weeks later, he got a phone call asking him if he could move to Los Angeles the following day to be a producer on The Home Show.

"It was the scariest thing I've ever done in my life. This was an American talk show, dealing with overnight ratings, dealing with a show that was 90 minutes. I had to learn to edit tape. I was petrified, but it was also the greatest experience in the world."

Having worked with different hosts, he was offered a gig right here in Canada, to produce the Dini Petty Show.

"I was asked to be part of the existing team to revamp the show and change it from the Dini Petty Show to The Dini Show."

Schwartz first saw Scott on The Dini Show, on a program about losing weight. Richard Simmons was on the show, and Scott made an appearance to discuss her starring role in the musical Crazy For You.

"Camilla came out tap dancing. What was so interesting was that she'd had a serious weight problem years ago, and so when she came out tap dancing, now weighing 120 pounds, and told her story, she took the attention away from Richard Simmons."

Schwartz and Morley Nirenberg presented the idea for a show starring Scott to BBS.

Shortly thereafter they did a pilot, and very soon after that the show went into production.

So far the show has been so successful that it's packed every night at the CFTO-TV studios in Scarborough, and on the second day of taping they were already sold out for weeks.

The Camilla Scott Show airs weekdays at 3 p.m. on BBS.

Holocaust films up for Oscars

LOS ANGELES – Two documentaries on Holocaust themes have been nominated for Academy Awards.

Anne Frank Remembered, which throws considerable new light on her life and death, was nominated in the Documentary Features category.

The two-hour film was written, produced and directed by London-based filmmaker Jon Blair. It is being released in North America in late February and early March.

Nominated in the Documentary Short Subjects category is One Survivor Remembers, a one-hour film about a Holocaust survivor recollecting her experiences.

The film was shown last May on HBO and won an Emmy.

Judy and David Gershon

Children's entertainers' careers come full circle

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three years ago, Judy and David Gershon decided to follow their dream to become children's entertainers.

The dynamic, duo along with their All Together Now Band, return to the Holy Blossom Temple on Feb. 25 at 4 p.m., where they presented their first big concert three years ago.

"It is hard to believe," says David. "We always said that we would give it a try for three years and here we are."

Judy and David have produced five albums, they have entertained tens of thousands of children and parents from coast to coast, sold more than five million cassettes from Canada to Singapore, and this month, they will premiere their first national television special titled, Judy and David's Music Shop on the Family Channel.

Their All Together Now Band consists of Tom Rasky on drums, his sister Michelle Rasky on keyboard, Michael Witzenhausen on bass guitar and Brandon Scott on a variety of instruments.

Judy and David have also gone online. You can visit them on the Internet and enjoy pictures, lyrics and sound clips. Their address is http://tanglewood.com.

Concert tickets are available at the office of Holy Blossom Temple or at the door. The admission of $8 includes a donation to Mazon Canada. For more information, call 416-789-3291, ext. 233.

Israeli Film: A recent Eye On Arts column mentioned the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in connection with some rare pre-state Israeli film footage shown at the Pordenone Silent Film Festival in Italy.

That item has prompted a letter from reader Sidney Brickman, a Torontonian wintering in Phoenix, Ariz., who notifies us that the deputy director of the Spielberg Archive, Hillel Tryster, is a former movie and theatre critic for the Jerusalem Post and Brickman's cousin through marriage.

In conjunction with the Pordenone Festival, Tryster has written a book, Israel Before Israel: Silent Cinema in the Holy Land. The book features chapters on cinematic pioneers like Yaacov Ben Dov and Joseph Gal-Ezer, and on the Palestine Foundation Fund, which showed Eretz Israel to the world. It is available through the Spielberg Archive.

In Brief: Straight From the Heart, a silent auction of art works, opens Feb. 25, 2 to 5 p.m., and continues until March 9 at Creative Spirit Art Centre, 1071 Bathurst St., Toronto 416-588- 8801. Also at La Parete Gallery, 1086 Bathurst St.

Haman was a drag Purim Ball

The Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League and the United Jewish Peoples' Order will present a community Purim celebration on Feb. 25 from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. The all-ages event will take place at Winchevsky Centre at 585 Cranbrooke Ave. (five blocks north of Lawrence off Bathurst Street in Toronto.)

Performers will sing Sephardi Purim songs, there will be live Klezmer music, a modern day satirical megillah reading, a performance of the Purim shpiel in drag, face paintings and more.

Tickets are $3 to$5. For more information, call 416-789-5502.

Correction

In the Feb. 8 issue of The CJN "Mushing with Huskies" story by Vera Gillman, the wrong name for the dog sledding outfit was inadvertently used. The correct name should have been Golden Valley.

Israeli juniors need help between the pipes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A remarkably astute remark was once attributed to Gene Ubriaco when the son of the Sault was coaching the Pittsburgh Penguins back in the mid 1980s.

"Goaltending," Ubriaco purportedly stated, "is 80 percent of hockey, unless you don't got none. Then it's 100 percent."

The wisdom behind Ubriaco's dictum is staring organizers of the Israeli junior hockey team squarely in the face as they prepare to ice a competitive team for an upcoming international event.

Not only are they gearing up for the 1996 European Junior Ice Hockey Championships, Pool D tournament, which runs from March 6 to 10 in Sofia, Bulgaria, but they're still beating the bushes searching for a young man with an Israeli passport who can tend the twine tent.

Oded Orgil, co-coach of the junior squad, believes "if we find a goalie, we have a shot" at winning.

Last year's starting goalie is too old now for the competition, which is limited to players born July 1, 1978 or later. A young goalie who served as backup to last year's starter is being groomed in Israel, but he's still pretty green and hasn't faced many tough shots, Orgil said.

Still, the rest of the team is shaping up nicely and figures to be better than the one that finished fifth out of seven at the 1995 event, Orgil said.

Joining Israel in this year's tournament are the Netherlands, Bulgaria and Turkey, which comprise Group A, and Yugoslavia and Greece, which with Israel make up Group B. The winner of the tournament moves up to play in Pool C next year.

Orgil said he'll be taking about 11 players from Canada to Sofia, a number equal to the Israel-based contingent. All players must have Israeli passports or have at least one parent born in the Jewish state.

Although the team wasn't set as of last week, Orgil said he expected three members of last year's eight-man Canadian contingent to return and take leadership roles on the team: centre Yaron Orgil, defenceman Simon Levine and centre Bryan Friedman.

Hockey players (from left) Simon Levine, Eli Oosterhuis and Yaron Orgil were part of the Canadian contingent that joined Israel's national junior team at last year's IIHF championships.

Yaron, Orgil's brother, plays for Hillcrest Midget AA, while Levine skates for Goulding Park Midget AAA and Friedman plays for Don Mills Flyers, a Bantam AAA team.

Most of the skaters who've tried out for the team have AA or AAA credentials and because the organization of the team is still rudimentary, it's likely the Canadian group will come exclusively from the Greater Toronto Area.

Joining Orgil, a member of Israel's senior national hockey team, as co-coach is Sergei Martin, an oleh from the former Soviet Union who is Orgil's teammate on the national team. Lev Genin, another former Soviet who's the national team's third-string goalie, is the Israel-based manager of the junior squad.

Although the Israel Ice Hockey Federation will provide airline tickets for the Canadians skaters, the Israeli hockey infrastructure is still run on a shoestring basis. Orgil is trying to round up corporate sponsors to provide team jackets and he's soliciting contributions for blue gloves and helmets, as well as new goalie equipment, to help the team look its best when it competes.

Anyone interested in making a contribution or even trying out for the goalie spot can contact Orgil at 905-881-3597.

Swimmers hopeful about Olympics

World Zionist Press Service

JERUSALEM — Record-breaking performances in the European Championships, held recently in Vienna, have greatly boosted the hopes of Israel's leading swimmers as they look towards the Atlanta Olympics next summer.

According to the experts, Israeli swimmers should, at the very least, reach three finals — a first for Israeli swimming.

The four-man team in Vienna consisted of two sabras — Yoav Bruck (freestyle) and Eitan Urbach (backstroke), and two new immigrants — Vadim Alexeyev (breaststroke) from the former Soviet Union and Dan Kutler (butterfly) from the United States.

Of the four, Bruck is the most likely to do well in the individual events, having finished sixth in the European Championships in the 50-metre freestyle final with a record Israeli time of 22.79 seconds.

Bruck's achievement came despite the sudden death of his father two months before.

"A week after his death I was due to attend an intensive training camp in France," recalls Bruck. "I considered not going. But my mother insisted that my father would have wanted me to carry on. I inherited my determination and single-mindedness from him."

Bruck, 23, returned to Israel last year after receiving an MA in communications from Auburn University, Utah, where he was on a sports scholarship. During his four-year sojourn, he was coached by American swimming trainer Dave Marsh.

In Israel, Bruck is now doing his compulsory army service. But under the IDF program for sporting excellence, he is in a non-combat job teaching English. This enables him to train everyday at Netanya's Wingate Institute.

Alexeyev, 28, who immigrated to Israel in 1992 from Alma Ata in Kazakhstan, has already succeeded in reaching an Olympic final. In 1988, he finished sixth in the Seoul Olympics while representing the former Soviet Union. In Vienna, representing his new homeland, Alexeyev finished seventh in the 100-m breaststroke with a time of 1.02.54 — a new Israeli record.

"I think Israel will win an Olympic swimming medal in Atlanta," says Alexeyev. "Why not? If we don't think positive, it won't happen. Yoav or I could do it in the individual events or it could happen in the medley relay."

The medley relay team resembles something like the ingathering of the exiles. Kutler, 23, from Santa Clara, Calif., is a graduate of UCLA in Business Administration. Always on the fringe of the U.S. swimming team, he swam for America in the 1991 World Student Games in England. But after participating in the Maccabiah Games in Israel in 1993, winning two gold medals in the 100-m and 200-m butterfly, "I fell in love with Israel," he says. "And it struck me that as a Jew, there could be no greater honor than representing Israel in the Atlanta Olympics."

David Sivor, general secretary of Israel's swimming association, recounts that several days after the Maccabiah, there was a knock on his office door. "And to my surprise, in walked this tall, fair haired, all-American boy telling me that he wanted to make aliyah and swim for Israel," he says. "I was skeptical and told him to go back to America and think seriously about it before committing himself."

Kutler remained determined and came back to Israel several months later. "My returning to Israel does not necessarily mean I'm here for life," Kutler says. "I'll review the situation after Atlanta. But I feel very much at home in Israel."

Kutler has not qualified for the Atlanta Olympics on an individual basis but will be there as part of the relay team. He finished 15th in the 100-m butterfly in the European Championships, but saved his best performance for the medley final where he swam a personal and Israeli record of 54.91.

The fourth member of the relay team, Urbach, 18, also swam a personal best in the Vienna final, completing the 100-m backstroke in 58.40. His best distance is 200 metres, in which he won the 1994 European Youth Championships. Still young by swimming standards, he did not make the final in the European Championships.

BENJAMIN'S PARK MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Dear Susan,

My 8-year-old daughter has peanut allergies. She wants to go to sleep-over camp, yet she has some reservations. How can I help her?

Dear Reader,

At the age of eight, children are going through a critical stage of development during which they are striving to master tasks and challenges. This involves seeing a task through from beginning to end, and learning to cope with frustrations on the way.

Your daughter is assessing her ability to master a new challenge: going to sleep-over camp. She needs to know that she can consider the question and ultimately gauge her own ability. While you certainly need to be part of the final decision, you must respect her assessment of her own abilities and go from there.

Your daughter's struggle is more complicated as a result of her peanut allergy. You can assist in the decision-making process by assessing the camp's willingness and ability to cope with a child with her problem. You should be able to determine to your own satisfaction the degree to which they will safeguard her diet, and the extent to which foods which will place her at risk will be present at the camp. You must certainly assess the competence of the staff to deal with her allergy. As part of this, you should determine how knowledgeable they are, their ability to administer epi-pens, and the location of the closest hospital.

Your daughter should be part of this assessment and evaluation. You will want to determine what your daughter's expectations are, and whether she will feel safe in that environment. Are the two of you comfortable in her managing her allergy while she is away? You and your daughter should each evaluate the situation individually and then compare notes. In the end, you will have to make the decision that reflects your mutual comfort level, based on your assessment of the facilities and your daughter's maturity. In the final analysis, only you and your daughter can adequately judge

In your situation, a little bit of paranoia is probably healthy. However, you should not let it prevent you from exploring new opportunities. Good luck and happy camping.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 17 years.

APRICOT NUT BREAD

2 1/2 cups all purpose flour
3 1/2 tsps baking powder
3 tblsp salad oil
1 egg
4 tsps grated orange peel
3/4 cup orange juice
1 cup sugar
1 tsp salt
1/2 cup milk, or parve creamer
1 cup finely chopped nuts
1 cup chopped apricots

Combine all ingredients. Beat on medium speed for 1/2 min., stirring constantly. Pour into greased and floured 9"x5"x3" loaf pan or two 8½"x4½"x2½" loaf pans. Bake 1 hr. at 350° or until pick in centre comes out clean. Cool thoroughly before slicing.

Recipe of the week

Please feel free to call The CJN and make requests for a favorite dish - we will try to answer. ENJOY!

TREE OF LIFE

Grade 4 students from Or Haemet Sephardic Schhol are seen with their teacher Mrs. Akierman. They are pointing to the tree of life that they created in an effort to help save endangered wildlife in the rainforest.

Grieving and coping

The face of inexpressible grief as it appears on a man stooped over the site of the early morning explosion in Jerusalem. [RNS photo]

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Near the mangled wreck of the No. 18 bus, a snack bar was doing brisk business on Sunday afternoon.

The crowd that gathered at the site of the most devastating suicide bus bombing in Israeli history was snatching up soft drinks and sandwiches. Twenty-four people were killed at this Jerusalem bus stop. But such attacks are becoming an almost routine part of Israeli life. And nowhere was that more apparent than at this site, where the macabre and mundane mingled so eerily just hours after the bombing.

Here on Jaffa Road, a block away from Jerusalem's Central Bus Station, hundreds of people congregated, some to pray, some to argue. A makeshift memorial to the victims was promptly erected. Leaflets with political slogans were distributed. A rally was called for the following day.

But there was something reflexive about these responses. When the TV cameras approached, the hotheads began chanting hateful slogans right on cue.

While the crowd sipped soft drinks and traded political cliches, the black-clad volunteers of Chesed Shel Emet went about their business: One poked at a pile of rubbish with tweezers; another balanced himself precariously on a slanted rooftop, clutching a plastic bag in one hand. Two years ago, these strange men would have aroused curiosity. Today they are a familiar feature in a familiar scene: the men who collect the fragments of human flesh for burial.

"It's as though we have gotten used to fire and death," wrote a journalist from the Hebrew daily Yediot Aharanot.

From the Editor

We are not unmindful of the incongruity in the almost surrealistic juxtaposition on this page, and indeed in this issue of the paper, of the painful images of mourning and death alongside sweetly innocent representations of Purim drawn by children from across Canada.

Despite the incongruity, we decided to continue with our Purim presentation, lest the Hamas murderers steal from our children our holidays and our heritage, even as they stole from the people whom they killed the lives that were so precious.

We absolutely delighted in the hundreds of drawings, which we received from children from as far away as St. John's and Calgary. Unfortunately, we could select only 12 as "winners". In truth, we at The CJN were the real winners of this contest for having been able to feast on the rich, beautiful colors of Purim sent to us. Featured on this page are three special honorable mentions. Happy Purim.

PM condemns "act of cowardice"

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien strongly condemned Sunday's terrorist attack in Israel, which claimed the lives of at least 27 people.

"Canadians are appalled by this senseless act of cowardice," said the prime minister. "There can be no justification for the taking of innocent lives."

In a letter to Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Chrétien offered his deepest sympathy to the families of the victims. On behalf of the Canadian government, he expressed strong support for the government of Israel in its efforts to pursue peace.

CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has condemned the two suicide bombings in Israel that killed at least 27 people and wounded more than 50 others.

"Terrorists are trying to kill the peace process," said CJC president Goldie Hershon. "They cannot be allowed to win. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has condemned the actions of Hamas, but sometimes words are not enough. He must do everything within his power to stop the Islamic fundamentalist group from perpetrating these acts of terrorism."

CJC has extended its sympathies to the people of Israel and the families of the victims.

CIC COMDEMNS TERRORIST BOMBINGS

TORONTO — Stephen Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, expressed shock over Sunday's two suicide terrorist bombings that left at least 27 Israelis dead and more than 50 others wounded.

Victor remarked: "Canadian Jews are outraged and deeply grieving the loss of life and devastating injuries caused by [Sunday's] attacks. We support the decision of Prime Minister Shimon Peres to seal Israel's boundaries with the West Bank and Gaza Strip and to temporarily suspend negotiations with the Palestinian Council, in response to these attacks.

"While we continue to support Israel's pursuit of peace with its Arab neighbors, Yasser Arafat must be more effective in stopping terrorism, emanating from areas transferred to Palestinian authority.

"We call upon the government of Canada to condemn Hamas' terrorist atrocities, and to continue its active participation in international efforts to halt Islamic terrorist groups which oppose the achievement of peace in the Middle East through rampant violence."

B'NAI BRITH CANADA

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada strongly condemns the brutal and cowardly bus attacks in Jerusalem and Ashkelon.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president, of B'nai Brith Canada issued the following statement:

First, our hearts and our sympathies go out to the families of all those who were killed or injured in the bus attacks. Second, we urge the government of Israel to use all measures at its disposal to fight this new wave of terrorism. Finally, we call upon Yasser Arafat, who has condemned these bombings, to send a clear message, by whatever means, to Islamic Jihad and Hamas that these activities will not be tolerated. Furthermore, Arafat should turn over to Israeli authorities, as mandated by the Oslo accords, those individuals wanted by Israeli officials who are residing in Palestinian controlled areas.

Israeli election a 'referendum' on peace

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's elections this May will be a "referendum" on the Labor government's peace policies, says Jerusalem's ambassador to the United States.

In fact, the election was moved up from October to May because Israel anticipates that talks with Syria will begin to make headway after the spring, Itamar Rabinovich told a synagogue audience here last week.

Rabinovich said Shimon Peres' Labor government wants a mandate to pursue peace with Syria.

The ambassador, who also heads Israel's bilateral peace talks with Syria, said Damascus "holds the key" to a comprehensive Middle East peace and to an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The Palestinian accords with Israel resulted in peace with Jordan, while a peace treaty with Syria would also bring about peace with Lebanon, much of which is controlled by the Syrians, Rabinovich said.

The dividends of peace are already seen in peace accords with several Arab countries and in Mideast-wide economic conferences, he noted.

And a peace deal with Syria would "marginalize" and weaken Iran, a Syrian ally, and "the single biggest threat to Israel."

Rabinovich said he told the Syrians that peace with them would never be like the relationship between Canada and the United States, "and they understood that."

Itamar Rabinovich

He likened a settlement with Damascus to "a table with four legs" — first, peace, meaning normal relations, open borders and tourism; second, the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the Golan Heights, without which a deal there is "impossible;" third, security arrangements for Israel to compensate for withdrawal; and fourth, a timetable for implementation.

Rabinovich did not mention giving up the Golan Heights, but he said that the late Yitzhak Rabin's idea of a referendum on the future of the heights "has not vanished."

As for the peace process, Rabinovich said the Gaza First plan and the extension of self-rule on the West Bank have been "successful."

Beginning in May, talks are scheduled for so-called "final status" issues: the form a Palestinian government will take, borders, refugees, water rights and the most important, Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem is an issue the Palestinians can raise, but we have made clear what our position is," Rabinovich said, referring to Israel's stance that Jerusalem is not negotiable.

He said he gives Palestinian president Yasser Arafat "a passing grade" in fighting terrorism and he believes Arafat will one day change the clause in the PLO's covenant that calls for Israel's destruction.

Rabinovich's talk was sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue's continuing education committee and B'nai Brith Canada.

Control of Jerusalem unbridgeable: Dore

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Differences between Israel and the Palestinians over the status of Jerusalem are so deep they are "unbridgeable," an Israeli commentator said here recently.

"The Palestinians want to control the Old City," said Dore Gold, of the Jaffee Centre, Tel Aviv University.

Gold struck a pessimistic note in his review of the Jerusalem situation at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synaogue. His contention that the Labor government has imperilled Israel's control of the city was in tune with the sentiments expressed by the audience during the question period.

It was the Oslo agreements and a letter Prime Minister Shimon Peres wrote to a Norway cabinet minister which gave Palestinians "a breakthrough" in their battle for Jerusalem, Gold said.

"We care about the future of Jerusalem and the Golan Heights," synagogue president Eric Goldberg said in opening the meeting.

Introducing the speaker, Rabbi Joseph Kelman declared: "Jerusalem is very much in our minds and hearts."

Gold refused to predict the winner in the Labor-Likud contest in the Israeli election in May and said the Israeli voter is faced with two nightmares: "If Likud wins, the peace process will explode and if Labor wins who will negotiate the final status of Jerusalem?

"No matter who wins, they will be judged by their ability to protect the national interest, and by that I mean Jerusalem," Gold said.

Too many 'existential problems'

I have been back from Israel for three weeks and still my notes from the visit remain open. In this column I shall record some impressions from the first of two field trips.

The day began with a trip to Mt. Herzl for a wreath-laying ceremony at the grave of Yitzhak Rabin. We sat, for the most part, silently, as the bus climbed the short distance from our hotel to the cemetery. It was raining and the misty clouds hung close to the top of the small mountain as we alighted. Memorial candles were given to those inclined to light one and leave it at the graveside. Almost everyone did so. I was chosen on behalf of our group, along with Leni Reiss, the editor of the Jewish News of Greater Pheonix, to lay the wreath at his grave.

Like most people in middle life, I have already had many occasions, unfortunately, to be at a cemetery. But it was the first time I had ever placed a wreath at a grave. It was an unfamiliar custom and I felt self-conscious. Worse, the self-consciousness was displacing in my mind the more appropriate emotions and thoughts I had hoped to feel as a result of the place and the occasion. I felt unworthy of the honor. Cameras flashed. K'el Maleh Rachamim was chanted.

After no more than 10 minutes, the ceremony was over. We were allowed a short time to wind our way back to the buses through the pine forest and the rain. People clustered in small groups walking past the graves whose marble and dolomite faces marked the final resting places of so many of Israel's founders and fallen soldiers.

I picked up a small Jerusalem stone, returned to Rabin's grave and placed it alongside the wreath. This felt more familiar, more appropriate. It was more of what I was used to doing in a cemetery. Wiping away the rain from my cheeks, I hurried back to the bus. I was the last to return.

By now, we were less news and information-gathering journalists than we were simply tourists. The transformation was completed by our next stop: the Tower of David Museum and the Old City. As we strolled, talked and marvelled at both sights and sites, many of us were hurriedly scribbling notes into our notebooks. But I imagine many of those notes were, like mine, personal reflections, measurements of where we stood.

We were quickly snapped out of our tourist reveries and "restored" to our professional responsibilities by Colonel David Chacham who was assigned the task of briefing us on the redeployment of the IDF in Judea and Samaria.

Chacham, true to his name, answered every question put to him directly and with little embellishment. His youth belied his experience and undoubtedly, his skill. I guessed him to be in his early 30s. He had already served five years in Gaza as the advisor to the military government. He was fluent in a number of languages, including Arabic, and said that he knew the Palestinians well.

Israel, he explained, is at a very important and delicate moment in the peace process, trying to find the basis to found a new relationship with the Palestinians based on mutual self- interest. Of note in the young colonel's remarks was the fact that he stressed mutual self- interest rather than mutual trust as the divining rod pointing the way to peace. Trust would be an outcome of peace, not its pretext.

The Oslo accords were predicated upon constant, frequent points of daily contact and joint problem-solving between Israeli and Palestinian security officers. He expressed the hope that as contact became routine so too would trust. But he did not want to mislead us into believing that "all the obstacles can be overcome" quickly or neatly. There were simply too many of what he termed, "existential problems" to resolve between the two peoples. He listed four: sovereignty over Jerusalem, Jewish settlements in Judea and Samaria, final borders and the questions of the refugees from the War of Independence.

Chacham believes the majority of Palestinians to be in favor of peace with Israel and that the results of the recent Palestinian elections have strengthened Yasser Arafat's hand in the autonomous regions. According to Chacham, Israel expects Arafat to take more effective steps against Hamas to stop the terror, even though the "bloody struggle" with them will take a long while.

Ontario seniors injured in Israeli accident

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three Ontario retirees were injured earlier this month — one of them seriously — in a bus accident in Israel.

Rose Rosen of North York, Ont., her sister, Ellen Bossin of Thornhill, Ont., and Hannah Cardaci, also of Thornhill, were hurt when the bus they were riding in missed a curve and tipped over.

Cardaci is immobile and will stay in hospital indefinitely, her daughter said. She said her father was scheduled to fly to Israel this past weekend to be with her mother.

Rosen, who's in her early 70s, was also still in hospital as of late last week, suffering from broken bones.

Her sister, Bossin, in her late 60s, was treated and released from hospital. She has some bruises and discomfort, her daughter-in-law, Jane Bossin, told The CJN.

The three Canadian women were part of a group of 43 American volunteers, most of them senior citizens, taking part in the two-month-long Active Retirees in Israel (ARI) program.

Holocaust centre opens resource facility

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Holocaust Memorial and Education Centre marked its 10th anniversary recently with the official opening of a new resource centre.

More than 250 people attended the celebration, which included speeches by dignitaries, community leaders and Holocaust Centre founders, followed by the unveiling of the Robert Rosen multimedia computer system.

The late Robert Rosen was a survivor who dedicated himself to educating others about the Holocaust and whose family made a generous contribution to the new resource centre in his memory.

The hi-tech multimedia computer in his name will link the Holocaust Memorial and Education Centre to the Washington Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Former Ontario premier Bob Rae, the main speaker, spoke about racism and hatred. Hitler persuaded people to "deny that Jews were human," he said. "We must refute this by existing and remembering."

He stressed that the best way to remember was through education "to establish little memorials in the hearts of Jews ... It happened and it can happen again."

Pointing to the recent discovery of mass graves in Bosnia, Rae urged Jews to condemn such atrocities. "In our own hearts we must recognize the existence of hatred and its persistence and have the courage to speak out against it."

Education best way to remember

He said the flip side to the tragedy of the Holocaust is "the triumph of the human spirit" — the creation of the state of Israel and the survivors who established new lives.

Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall told the audience she pledged to work with the Jewish community to fight hatred and racism. Manuel Prutschi, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, praised the centre for its educational contribution. He called the centre "a sacred place that rekindles the memory."

Other speakers included Eleanor Getzler, chair of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee; Gerda Steinitz-Frieberg, honorary chair of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre; Marshall Kesten, executive committee board member, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto; Nate Leipciger, co-chair, Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Congress; Reverend Earl Albrecht, chair of the Christian Jewish dialogue of Toronto; Monte Kwinter MPP Wilson Heights; Israeli trade commissioner Yael Varsano-Barzilay, representing the Israeli consul general; and Anita Ekstein, chair of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

More than 500,000 people, 150,000 of whom have been students, have visited the centre in the last decade. Visitors have had the opportunity to hear survivor volunteers — there is a rostrum of more than 100 speakers — give first-hand accounts of their experiences.

What is the test of good manners? Being able to bear patiently with bad ones.

Tory government cutbacks denounced at forum

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A University of Toronto professor of Social Policy sees no point in trying to change the minds of Ontario Premier Mike Harris and his government regarding provincial cutbacks.

"Their minds are made up," said Ernie Lightman in a scathing denunciation of Harris. "It's the next election we're fighting, along with the strategy to paralyze [the current provincial government]. We have to do what we can to help them screw up even more. The next election has already started."

Lightman was one of five panelists at a forum chaired by Toronto Star columnist Ellie Tesher last week at Holy Blossom Temple. The event, entitled The Cutbacks and Economic Alternatives: Where does the Jewish Community Fit In? was sponsored by fledgling organization Tzedek: The Jewish Campaign for Economic Justice, and drew a crowd of over 100 people.

Joining Lightman as part of the panel were Mark Adler of St. Clair Meals on Wheels, Gail Gould of Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS), Evelyn Shulman of the Association of Jewish Seniors and Jason Stevens of the Canadian Federation of Students.

While Adler placed some of the blame for Ontario's health care cutbacks on former prime minister Brian Mulroney's administration, he criticized Harris' government for "utilizing the recommendations [of a district health council] to close hospitals without putting anything better in their place ... the fact that there are no 24-hour clinics has resulted in inappropriate and costly use of emergency services."

Stevens focused on education, suggesting that "if we believe education is [only] for the privileged and the rich, we should back the Harris agenda."

Cutbacks affecting universities have resulted in tuition increases of 88 percent since 1990, Stevens noted. At colleges, programs are being eliminated, forcing students to transfer schools or not complete their course of study, he said.

Privatizing post-secondary education would result in a two-tiered system where less privileged students would "only be able to afford public education of a declining quality," he said.

JF&CS is trying to mitigate the effects of a $400,000 cut in its 1996 budget by servicing more clients in groups and on the phone, said Gould. Clients who receive financial assistance have been "severely affected," she added.

Abused women already have fewer resources available to them, Gould noted. Legal aid, for example, is "in complete upheaval. Lawyers are refusing legal aid certificates because payment is not assured."

As a result of government cutbacks, most services for abused women will "only focus on food and shelter," she said. Meeting emotional needs will be seen as a luxury, she warned.

Lightman, an economist, said the government of Ontario "has no interest in eliminating the deficit. That's simply marketing. If [they were], they wouldn't be implementing huge tax cuts to benefit the rich."

Much of the change proposed by the Harris government will be irreversible, Lightman believes.

The Harris government, which is not a traditional right-wing Conservative government, Lightman noted, "wants to drive into the ground everyone who happens to be vulnerable or dependent."

Lightman strongly recommended informing local MPPs how you plan to vote next election and why.

Dr. Ernie Lightman

Audience member Michele Landsberg, a Toronto Star columnist and outspoken socialist, encouraged "speaking to our own community. Many of them voted for this government."

Tzedek was designed in large part for that purpose, explained a representative of the group. Future plans include demonstrations and educational events.

Branson supporters rally for hospital

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It will cost more to merge Branson Hospital than to leave it alone, North York Mayor Mel Lastman told a gala Save Branson, $150-a-plate dinner.

The hospital's fate is now up to an Ontario government task force to be named in the next four months, which will consider a recommendation to merge Branson with York-Finch Hospital, Lastman said.

"It leaves the door open for strong and persuasive arguments against closing Branson," he added.

Talks are underway with other hospitals to keep Branson open, perhaps in a different form, a source close to the discussions told The CJN. In the meantime, the source said, the campaign to save Branson goes full steam ahead.

The gala, attended by 400 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, also honored Lastman for his 24 years as mayor and Kenny Bodenstein of Steeles Memorial Chapel, chair of the gala, for his efforts to keep the hospital open.

The campaign got support from honorary chair Leslie Dan, who declared that the report from the Metro District Health Council recommending Branson's merger was "flawed" because it miscalculated the savings to be achieved and ignored the hospital's sensitive role in treating ethnic groups and in particular the elderly.

Closing Branson would leave the area as the one community in Metro without hospital service nearby, Dan said. Also, he said, the report overlooked the importance of Branson's geriatric program and its accreditation to train fourth year medical students.

Heart attack victims may die before getting help if they have to go to York-Finch or North York General Hospital in rush hour, Lastman said.

"They'll never make it. After four minutes it's too late," he said.

In fact, the hospital treats 400 heart attack victims a year and 20 percent of all its admissions are for cardiac problems. Twenty percent of the patients served by the hospital are over age 65.

An air of optimism prevailed at the balloon-decorated gala where a new song was heard: "Saving Branson our Way" by band leader Bill Drew. A silent auction of donated paintings, furniture, resort trips, restaurant meals and sports equipment also raised money for the campaign to keep Branson open.

Many of Branson's 300 physicians and other hospital personnel attended, including several representatives of the Seventh Day Adventist Church which runs the hospital.

"Branson is a hospital for the healing of body and soul," said Rabbi Joseph Kelman. Its closeness to the synagogue meant that a congregant who suffered a heart attack during serices was able to get help within three minutes, he said.

JSF talent show slated for York U

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An upcoming talent show-cum-fundraiser organized by York University students will feature something for everyone, says coordinator Natalie Margitta, a 21-year-old with a penchant for Ethel Merman tunes.

The March 10 event, presented by the university's Jewish Student Federation (JSF), will be held at Comedywood to raise money for Alzheimer's disease research.

Margitta, the JSF's vice-president of social programming, dreamed up the talent show when she realized that last year's planned social events, such as pub nights, didn't include "a forum for students to express their creativity."

Together with committee heads Barbie Green and Hedi Newman, both 22, and a behind-the-scenes crew of about 25 people, Margitta has been working on the show since the fall. The three students will co-host the show, and Newman will sing a Broadway tune with George Brown College student Miriam Suraski.

The show, which includes about a dozen acts chosen after on-campus auditions, runs about 2½ hours and will be followed by a dance with TNT Sound deejays.

For the price of a $12 ticket, people will "get their money's worth and help out a good cause," Margitta said.

Unlike most performances at the Thornhill comedy club, the JSF evening will not include stand-up comedy. But there will be "a big variety," promised Margitta, who will sing If They Could See Me Now from Sweet Charity.

Other musical numbers run the gamut from rap to pop to an Italian love ballad to Lynard Skynard. Dance numbers and a humorous drama skit are also included.

Margitta is pleased that the show will enable students to give back to the greater community and serve to "showcase Jewish talent." (About 70 percent of the performers are Jewish.)

For further information or to purchase tickets, call the JSF office at 416-736-5178.

THE MORRIS M. PULVER SCHOLARSHIP FUND OF ISRAEL is pleased to announce

APPLICATIONS ARE NOW AVAILABLE FOR THE 1996-97 ACADEMIC YEAR

For undergraduate, graduate and post-graduate students who are Canadian citizens residing in Canada in need of financial aid and who are eligible to attend recognized institutions of higher learning in Israel as designated by the Council of Higher Education in Israel.

The Council for Higher Education is the state institution responsible for higher education in Israel. The Council's authority derives from the Council of Higher Education Law - 1958.

The fund is administered on the basis of the dictates of the will of the late Morris M. Pulver which states:

"The total residue of my estate ... shall be used to provide scholarships in Israel to students who ... have excellent scholarship capabilities and who are in need of this type of financial aid and who are eligible to attend recognized institutions of higher learning in Israel."

Accordingly, the committee has deemed the following institutions presently for consideration:

Universities
Bar Ilan University, Ben Gurion University, Haifa University, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, The Open University of Israel, Technion, Tel Aviv University, Weizmann Institute

Other Institutions of Higher Education
Bezalel Academy, Jerusalem College of Technology, Michlalah-Jerusalem College for Women, Rubin Academy, Shenkar College, Association of Regional Colleges

Institutions for the Training of Teachers
Beit-Berl Teachers Training College, David Yellen Teachers College, Levinsky Teachers College, "Oranim" (Training of Kindergarten, Primary School and Special Education Teachers), State Teachers College Seminar Hakibbutz, Zinman College of Physical Education at the Wingate Institute

Please Note: To be eligible, applicants for undergraduate studies must possess an Ontario Secondary School Diploma (OSSD) or its equivalent.

APPLICATIONS MUST BE RECEIVED BY MAY 1, 1996.

We are pleased to report that for the 1995-96 academic year, over 700 scholarships were awarded to students studying at the above-noted institutions.

Application requests will only be responded to in writing from:

The colors of Purim

In Israel last Sunday, a group of early morning travellers had intended merely to start a new week in the ordinary course of their everyday lives. But a new cadre of Hamas murderers prevented them. Twenty-seven human beings were blown apart, some to unrecognizable shreds; scores were injured; countless more were traumatized; and an entire nation was outraged.

The people of Israel have been there before, in that penumbral place between rage and mourning, between courage and helplessness, between seeking peace but not knowing whom to trust. And each time, as mourning mounts, so too does rage.

More prosaically, we had intended to publish this week an unreservedly celebratory issue to mark the holiday of Purim. But that too has been affected. We will still celebrate Purim in this issue. That is our obligation to God and to the people whose lives were taken last Sunday morning. But like so many ceremonies in Jewish history, it shall be celebrated with broken glass underfoot.

More than 200 children responded to our request to send us original art portraying some aspect of the story of Purim. We were deeply gratified by this response. It had doubled from that of one year ago. And we were overwhelmed by the dazzling display of rich and resplendent colors. Obviously, beyond the adult's imagination is a kaleidoscope of primary and secondary colors in which children dream and play and grow.

The children's colors communicate to us. They tell us what their young eyes perceive in the story of Purim.

All colors, as we know, are but reflections of individual wavelengths of light, forces of energy which register through our eyes into our minds as the expression of yet another of nature's unexplained secrets. But, as we also know, all colors are contained in white light, the visible spectrum from red to violet, that forms when light passes through a prism or a raindrop.

Thus, in one seemingly indivisible ray of pure white sun, we find in fact a harmony of diverse colors, each distinct, but each dependent on the other to form the life-giving whole. The union of all the colors takes them beyond individual beauty and grace into a realm of physics and metaphysics, of elementary yet indestructible forces and of higher purposes.

In the pictures that they sent us, in the innocent, bold, creative cast of their colors, the children have drawn for us the essence of Purim.

The individuality of the colors, like the individuality within the Jewish people, gives life its texture and independence and freedom. But the union of the colors, like the unity within the Jewish people, gives life its strength and balance and purpose.

No fewer than four times in climactic Chapter 9 of the story of Purim is the verb nik'hal – to unite, to assemble together – used. The first reference (9: 2) is the most telling. The others reinforce the theme. "The Jews assembled and united together ... and no force was able to stand against them." The message is unsubtle. The Jewish people must be united.

The upcoming election in Israel is arguably the most important in the country's history. Yet, the people is deeply divided along political and religious lines. We in the Diaspora, alas, are but a mirror image of the divisions which exist in Israel. Now more than ever, we must assemble and unite together, so that no force will be able to stand against us. Unity is the message of Purim. It is evident in the childrens' drawings.

The evil Hamas murderers will occasionally succeed in killing individual Jews, but they cannot stand against a united Jewish people. They might as well try to destroy a rainbow.

WISDOM OF THE AGES
The space in a needle's eye is sufficient for two friends, but the whole world is scarcely big enough to hold two enemies.

ON PURIM WE'RE SUPPOSED TO WEAR FUNNY COSTUMES...
DRINK 'TIL WE'RE DRUNK, PARTY 'TIL DAWN...
AND HONOR ESTHER, WHO MARRIED A NON-JEW
PURIM IS THE PERFECT HOLIDAY FOR MODERN JEWRY.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History
March 1, 1913 Jewish students at Aberdeen primary school, Montreal, marched out on strike after a Protestant teacher implied that Jews were "dirty". Eventually a committee negotiated the students' return to class. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Most families want some Jewish education

Allow me, please, to correct inaccuracies in the account of an interview with me in the Jan. 25 CJN education supplement.

Among them was a statement attributed to me that "we are not reaching any more than 50 percent of Jewish youngsters." What I said was that during the course of their school careers, some 85 to 90 percent of Jewish children have contact with a Jewish educational institution for some period, but that at any given time, there are no more than 50 percent who are actually pursuing Jewish learning of any sort.

Such a period of limited Jewish study is regrettable, and one could only wish that we might find the means of altering the minimalism with regard to Jewish education with which too many parents are satisfied. What is worthy of note, though, is that an overwhelming number of families seek out a Jewish educational experience for some period during their children's lives — perhaps only a year for some; for others, several years — and this should be viewed as encouraging.

Also, the article describes me as having stated that our education system "has not reached far enough into Reform and unaffiliated homes, where most of the Jewish population resides." During an extended discussion, I spoke of some among the unaffiliated whose children are denied entirely a Jewish education, but did not single out any denomination, Reform or other, in this regard.

If, as many of us believe fervently, quality Jewish education is the basis for meaningful, exciting and creative Jewish continuity, then the task of reaching out to parents and children, to promote among them Jewish learning as a lifetime commitment, must not and cannot be limited to any one group in our midst.

Donate property claims to charity

My friend in Toronto, George Scott, has a property claim in Hungary. Scott's grandfather was the owner of substantial agricultural land in pre-World War II Hungary, but everything was taken away when the family was deported to Auschwitz. At today's market price, the property may be worth $1 million. As sole heir, Scott has pursued his restitution claim for years, but recently he was told that at the most he might receive $1,000, while it would cost considerably more in legal expenses to pursue the matter.

I also have claims against the Hungarian government for property and assets that were confiscated by the Nazis. Is there any way to donate my claim to a worthy Jewish organization? If the answer is Yes, then you could provide a great public service by informing your readers how we might do some good with our vast vineyards of wrath.

Allow 3,400 Ethiopian Jews into Israel

Your excellent summary of the issues underlying the recent demonstration by Ethiopian Jews contained one significant omission. Our community is extremely concerned about the situation of 3,400 of its members, who for six years have been living in Addis Ababa under appalling conditions, awaiting permission to leave for Israel. Many have close relatives in Israel including soldiers serving in the IDF.

While previously challenged by an Israeli ministerial committee, their eligibility for immigration under Israel's Law of Return is now beyond question. In 1993, a committee of the Chief Rabbinate recognized them as a Jewish community. Recently, the National Religious Party issued an urgent appeal to Prime Minister Shimon Peres to bring them to Israel immediately since "they are without doubt part of Israel and live as Jews in all respects."

It has caused great suffering in Addis Ababa and has led to great anger in the Ethiopian community in Israel, explaining in part the unprecedented demonstration in Jerusalem.

Finestone was cabinet's alarm clock

Re: Richard Cleroux's column of Feb. 8. In my two years of service to Sheila Finestone, I have seen her work tirelessly for her constituents, both as an MP and as a member of the government of Canada. Of all the secretaries of state, she was the one invited most often to make presentations to Cabinet. Her ability to bring to the fore issues of importance to all Canadians, whether child support, hate crimes or gender equality, was well recognized and effective. The prime minister, in referring to her constant concern for equity in federal government policies named her the "Cabinet Alarm Clock."

Between mouthfuls of hamantashen

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

Growing up in Montreal in the 1930s, we celebrated Purim and Chanukah as community and family simchahs. The two holidays were linked in my mind because of the plays we performed at the Davis YMHA for each of them.

In December 1932, at age 10, I took part in my first Chanukah play as a member of the soldiers' chorus in Judah Maccabee's army. A few months later, I was cast as a hamantash in the chorus of the Purim shpiel at the Y. A week before the play was to be performed, disaster struck. My sister caught the mumps!

In those days, when one child became ill with a contagious disease, all the children in the family were quarantined. I didn't mind missing a few days of school, but to miss the Purim shpiel would be a tragedy for me.

I phoned the director to tell him why I couldn't be in the play, hoping he would say the play couldn't go on without me. He said he was sorry, but he would have to find someone else to take my place. I learned the sad truth – that the Purim shpiel could go on successfully without me.

But there was still one place I could visit – Grandma's house. Bubbie was my favorite relative. We visited her on every Shabbat as well as on Purim and all other holidays. I set out for Grandma's, where I immediately unburdened myself about my sad loss at missing the Purim play.

"Sha, sha, it's not so terrible," my Grandma said. "You'll have lots of other Purims and lots of other shpiels. And talking about lot," she added, "did I ever tell you the story about Purim lots?

"A teacher once explained to her class that pur means 'lot' and Purim means 'lots.' She asked her students to find out the meaning of 'lots' when they went home that day. The next day, when the teacher asked the class what they found, one boy stood up and replied:

" 'Lot, the nephew of Abraham, had lots of lots. Lot also had lots of trouble with his wife, and what a lot was hers. We expect to have lots of fun on Purim, the Feast of Lots.' "

Grandma laughed at her own story and I soon chimed in, saying, "Talking about lots, Bubbie, how about lots of hamantashen, please?" I didn't have to ask a second time. A plate of hamantashen and strudel immediately appeared.

Between mouthfuls I asked Grandma a question I had asked before but I still like to hear the answer: "How come your hamantashen and strudel are different from my mother's?"

"That's because mine are Poilishe," she replied. "Your mother married a Rumainisher, so she had to learn how to make Rumainishe hamantashen and strudel."

My grandmother was born in Poland around 1870 and immigrated to England with her family when she was very young. Though her mother-tongue was Yiddish, she was completely fluent in English. But she learned to make Polish-style Purim goodies.

My mother learned from my father's meema (aunt) to make Romanian-style delicacies. In fact, my mother made the very finest paper-thin strudel dough which she filled with nuts, centred with Turkish delight. I never encountered a more delicious, mouth-watering pastry.

But being diplomatic I said to my grandma: "Both kinds of strudel are delicious, but I get nuts in my teeth no matter which I eat."

"I hope you are brushing your teeth regularly," Grandma admonished. "You don't want to go to the dentist to have a tooth pulled.

"Once when we were still living in England," she continued, "your zayde had to go to the dentist just before Purim to have a tooth pulled. When zayde offered to pay him, the dentist refused, saying: 'Let it be my shalach mones gift for you.'

" 'A groiser dank – thank you very much,' Zayde answered, 'but I won't tell any of my friends about this. If I did, some of them might offer me the same kind of shalach mones.' "

"I certainly wouldn't like that kind of shalach mones," I said seriously. "But we won't be able to visit our neighbors this year to give or get shalach mones."

"Well you can still get shalach mones from me," Grandma said, and she packed a bag of Purim goodies for me to take home. I then repeated the popular Purim rhyme:

Haint is Purim, morgen is ois,
Gib mir a groschen un varf mir arois.
(Today is Purim, tomorrow it's gone, give me a penny and send me on.)

She placed a penny in my hand and sent me home.

Direct elections new for Israel

The Israeli elections on May 29 will be the first in a new era in Israeli democracy. Four million Israelis will go to the polls to cast two ballots — the first, to elect their candidate of choice for prime minister, in direct elections. The candidate who wins over 50 percent of the votes will become prime minister. If no one wins a majority in the first round, a second run-off will be held between the two candidates with the largest number of votes.

By Shira Herzog

In their second ballot, Israelis will elect their party of choice to the Knesset. In Israel's system of proportional representation, 1.5 percent of the popular vote gives a party one seat in the Knesset. Following the election, the elected prime minister will try to form a coalition representing a majority of Knesset members, but he will not be dependent on them for his office.

This revolution in Israel's parliamentary democracy is the product of a lengthy, tortuous process that has been discussed and analyzed in thousands of articles and academic studies. It stemmed from changes in voting patterns that undermined the relative stability of governance and coalition building that had prevailed until 1977. Although no party in Israel ever had a parliamentary majority and coalition negotiations were often complex, several factors contributed to a satisfactory status quo and a tolerable price for the formation of a coalition government. The dominance of Mapai (later known as the Labor Party) and its ability to reach agreements with the Zionist Religious camp guaranteed a centre-left coalition that had no serious rivals.

The formation of a Likud-led government in 1977 created a new situation. There were now two political axes that were capable of forming a government. The result was a more democratic arena, on the one hand, but one that was far more vulnerable to the pressures of small parties, on the other. The blatant horse-trading that accompanied coalition negotiations and the ability of one- or two-member factions to demand exorbitant prices for joining coalitions produced unprecedented abuses of the system and widespread calls for reform.

Revolution in Israel's democracy

The subsequent electoral changes came about as a result of a web of sustained pressures and actions by Knesset members from several parties and a number of extra-parliamentary groups. Both Yitzhak Rabin and Benjamin Netanyahu supported direct elections of the prime minister as a way of freeing the post from some of the strains of coalition government — probably as a result of their direct exposure to the American presidential system.

Supporters of the new system have great expectations. They hope for a stabilization of the executive branch; a "safety net" against excessive demands from small parties; a clearer distinction between the executive and legislative branches; and a greater chance of effective action by the cabinet and prime minister, freed of the imperative of preoccupation with coaliton trivia.

Opponents of the new system warn of several dangers. These include exaggerated expectations from the new system and the attendant frustration when these are not met; a personalization of Israel's political culture and a movement away from ideology as a central factor in it; the potential for a chronic deadlock of a Knesset in opposition to its prime minister, without the American tradition of coexistence in similar situations; and the loss of the current checks and balances in the cabinet that might, in turn, result in overt independence on the part of the prime minister.

There are some observers that say "yes, but" to the new system. Some of these believe that Israel should move quickly to legislate its constitution to clarify the responsibilities of all three branches of government; others argue that a change from proportional representation to a constituency-based electoral system is an essential next step; and some have even advocated complete reform to an American presidential system.

Israel's municipal elections have been conducted by a two-ballot system since the late '70s. The experience has been largely successful, but the national arena is far more complex. Only time will tell how the new experiment will fare. Ironically, and sadly, Yitzhak Rabin, the man who ran his government as though the new system was already in place, will not be present at the first, critical test in the constitutional laboratory that the law of direct elections has created.

Jews and the welfare state

Jews have been the earliest and most steadfast defenders of the welfare state. As American conservative commentator Irving Kristol once put it, they "earn like Episcopalians and vote like Puerto Ricans." Throughout the post-war period, American Jews supported higher taxes, and state intervention in protecting the weak and promoting social goals.

By Morton Weinfeld

In the United States, Jews resisted the appeal of the Gingrichites, as well as the Perot movement, and supported Bill Clinton and the Democrats. In Canada, it is likely that Jews are wary about the more extreme manifestations of the budget cutting mania which is sweeping the country.

Jewish support for the welfare state continues to require explanation. Jews are largely a middle and upper middle class group. So by supporting the welfare state, they in effect vote to keep their own taxes high, though they are relatively less likely to benefit. Why do they do it?

Many Jews look to traditional Jewish culture for reasons. The Bible commands Jews to care for widows and orphans and to give tzedakah. Jews do not choose to give charity, they are obliged to do so. In addition, the Jewish religion encourages Jews to create a just society here on earth, rather than wait for the next world.

But this cannot be the only explanation. Parts of it can also apply to Christianity. There has long been a tradition of social activism and compassion within Protestant and Catholic traditions, despite the theological reliance on Christ as the route to salvation.

Another cultural explanation relies on the Jewish value of learning. Jews prefer to solve problems with rational solutions and planning, based on the application of knowledge. Government programs might appear to have that quality. (Think back to F.D.R. and the New Deal.)

These core Jewish values play a major role. But other explanations for Jewish support for the basic principles of the welfare state combine elements of self-interest and pragmatism.

Jews, as a historically vulnerable minority despite recent economic gains, fear social instability. Increasing gaps between the haves and the have nots may lead to conditions of social and political turmoil. Jews in the Old World feared the wrath of the poor or the dispossessed, whether peasants or urban masses. So policies which seek to minimize economic inequalities and injustices can indirectly benefit Jews.

In any case, North American Jews cannot be viscerally anti-government. It was government that sent troops to fight the Nazis, government that remained supportive of Israel, and government that passed anti-discrimination legislation which benefits Jews among others. Government in North America is not the czar.

A second factor deals directly with the impact of budget cuts as proposed by the Republicans in the United States or by the federal and provincial governments in Canada. Jews are disproportionately employed in the helping professions which can be adversely affected by these current trends. Jews work in health care, in education, in social services and in government, all targets for cuts and downsizing. Moreover, while Jews may underutilize welfare or unemployment, they may overutilize the educational and health systems.

Jews do not want their jobs or valued services cut. They do want to live in a just, compassionate society. While many Jews recognize the need to keep the lid on government deficits, one suspects strongly they would tilt the mix more toward tax increases than to budget cuts. The legacy of the exodus from Egypt lives on.

Syrian Christians

In the view of the world (which includes the Jewish world) there are two groups of people inhabiting Israel: Jews and Arabs. The latter are generally identified as Muslims, though — especially in Israel — they are also frequently Christians. Yet we hear little of Christians in the land, whether Arab or non-Arab. We have a vague impression of bearded priests walking in procession at Easter and Christmas, but that's about all most of us ever hear of them.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

To be sure, their numbers are not large, and they are becoming smaller. With some exceptions, their major role is to guard and maintain their sacred rites and buildings, though some of their efforts (especially among the French component) are directed toward archeology and biblical scholarship. There are now some 10 sects active in Jerusalem, and one of the smallest comprises the Syrian Christians.

"Syrian?" you will ask. How come they are in the Jewish capital, when their nation does not even recognize the Jewish state? But "Syrian" has nothing to do with Israel's political neighbor whom the Israeli administration is currently sounding out in Maryland, to explore whether there are indeed possibilities of mutual accommodation.

Officially known as the Syrian Orthodox Church, the sect is distinguished by the fact that its prayer language is Aramaic, the same tongue which was once spoken throughout the ancient Middle East, including the Jewish community. The Talmud reflects this fact as do some of our oldest prayers, like the Kaddish, Hebrew is, of course, a close linguistic relative, but was no longer fully understood by many Jews 2,000 years ago. When the Torah was read in the synagogue, a translator (m'turgeman) would stand beside the reader and render every verse into Aramaic for the sake of the congregation. The Syrian Church members are among the remnants of Aramaic speaking people; others are dispersed in Lebanon, Iraq, Iran and the Gulf states. They are, in fact, often known as Assyrians rather than Syrians.

Their Jerusalem church is built on the spot where, according to Archbishop Jajjawi, the Last Supper took place, which Leonardo da Vinci's artistry made into one of the most famous paintings ever created. The present building stems from the time of the crusaders. Two hundred members of the church live in Israel's capital, the rest are in Bethlehem and a few other places, including the United States.

My information comes from a bulletin published several times a year by the Association of Christians and Jews in Israel.

Some time ago, there was vigorous opposition to the establishment of a Mormon Centre in the city, because many feared that it would sponsor conversionist activities. As far as I know, the fears have proven groundless. Judaism is not in danger from sources such as these. It is however endangered from within: by ignorance and assimilation (both here and there), and by a lack of dialogue between opposite points of view. Arguments about the peace process are only part of the conundrum and not the most troublesome.

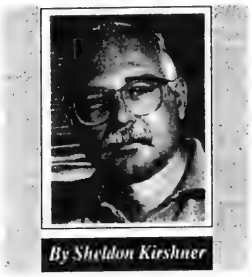
Jacobovici explores mystery of Jewish existence in film



By Sheldon Kirshner

In the past few months, there has been a resurgence of interest in the Spanish Inquisition. Last year, publishers brought out two books, Erna Paris' The End of Days and Benzion Netanyahu's The Origins of the Inquisition.

Now, Simcha Jacobovici — a Toronto filmmaker — plans to unveil a documentary about the descendants of Jews who were forced to convert to Christianity before and during the infamous Inquisition. Expulsion and Memory is scheduled to be screened on TVOntario early next month to coincide with the Purim holiday.

Its focus is on the Conversos, known also as New Christians or Marranos. The vast majority were fully assimilated, but a minority secretly clung to their Jewish heritage while practising Christianity. Jacobovici's absorbing film zeroes in on these people.

Jacobovici, born in Israel and raised in Montreal, made Expulsion and Memory over a period of several years. The seed of the project was planted by one of his former associates, Roger Pyke, who brought a newspaper article to his attention.

It turned on a group of Hispanic Americans in New Mexico — the ancestors of an early colony of crypto-Jews — who had found out about their Jewish origins and were stirred by their discovery.

Jacobovici was fascinated by these sons and daughters of the Conversos. "How could it be, 500 years after the conversions, that some of their ancestors were walking around feeling Jewish? What Jewish customs and folklore had survived?"

With these unanswered questions ringing in his ears, Jacobovici rushed to produce a film on the topic in time for the 500th anniversary of the expulsion of Jews from Spain. But 1992 was not to be a favorable year for a documentary of this kind. The television networks he approached lacked the funds and seemed basically cool to the idea.

He kept trying, but to no avail. He was on the verge of giving up when Lilli Fournier, a Toronto woman interested in Sephardi culture, came to his rescue. "She had access to individuals with money," he said.

Eventually, Jacobovici enlisted the financial support of TVOntario, Vision TV, the Ontario Film Development Corp. and the Ontario Arts Council. Later, he signed an agreement with Malo Films to distribute Expulsion and Memory internationally.

Once all these arrangements had been completed, Jacobovici, 42, travelled widely: New Mexico, Spain, Portugal and Israel.

Far from wishing to make a factual documentary, his goal was a spiritual film that would explore "the subtlety and mystery of Jewish existence."

Jacobovici was touched by the experience of interviewing the scions of Conversos. He was particularly moved by a New Mexican war veteran who choked up as he spoke and by a Spaniard in a remote town who asked for a mezuzah from Israel.

"My own Jewishness," Jacobovici said, "was deepened by being exposed to them."

Expulsion and Memory is neither Jacobovici's first nor his last film on a Jewish-related subject.

He directed his first documentary, Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews, in 1984. Then, a few years ago, he released Deadly Currents, his award-winning feature on the intifadah. Looking ahead, he is planning a film about the so-called 10 lost tribes of Israel.

Presently in pre-production is Hollywoodism, based on Neal Gabler's best seller, An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood.

Jacobovici and his partner, Elliott Halpern, the principals of Associated Producers, are currently working on a cornucopia of general interest films. They run the gamut from Sex Cops, which revolves around child sex slavery in India, to The Plague Fighters, which deals with the deadly Ebola virus outbreak in Zaire.

Wiesel remains personally elusive

Elie Wiesel, the novelist and Nobel Peace Prize laureate, needs no introduction, certainly not in the Jewish world. Suffice it to say that no Jewish writer today is as globally renowned as Wiesel. And yet, paradoxically, he remains personally elusive.

Readers who wish to penetrate the veil may read Wiesel's newly-published memoirs, All Rivers Run to the Sea (Random House, $36), the first of two projected autobiographies.

Poignantly written, All Rivers Run to the Sea is a richly woven tapestry of a turbulent life. Unfolding more or less in chronological order, the book conveys us from a Carpathian mountain village to Jerusalem, in no less than 500 pages.

Between these geographic poles, Wiesel describes his beloved family and his passage through two concentration camps in a prose style which at times soars to poetic heights.

Tallying up the post-war years, he tells of his unconsummated tryst with a German war widow, of his days as a struggling student in France, and of his initiation into journalism. Last but not least, he summons up memories of a "turning point," a cathartic trip to the Soviet Union in 1965 which prompted him to write The Jews of Silence.

Yet, at the end of this exhaustive journey of the mind and of the spirit, you feel that Wiesel has somehow managed to slip out of your grasp. He thus remains a remote and inhibited figure.

Wiesel, however, is a keen observer, and in this respect, he does not disappoint a reader.

He resurrects Sighet, an ethnically diverse outpost of the Austro-Hungarian empire which passed from Romanian to Hungarian hands.

He recounts the roundup of the Jews of Sighet, condemning the malice and cruelty of the Hungarian gendarmes who rousted them from their homes.

He remembers his "darkest day," the bitter moment in Buchenwald when his father died and he, Wiesel, was "bursting with pain."

But how does a religious Jew like Wiesel respond to the savagery of the Holocaust? Although his faith was not shaken by his experiences, he admits he will never "cease to rebel against those who ... permitted Auschwitz, including God."

In the aftermath of the war, Wiesel found his bearings, burying himself in the study of Judaism, in the faculty of letters at the Sorbonne and in a mountain of books.

He drifted into newspaper work by way of an obscure Zionist periodical. It led to a career in journalism, first as an underpaid, Paris-based foreign correspondent for Yediot Ahronot, and then as a writer for the Forverts in New York City. Reporting, in turn, encouraged him to wade into creative writing. Since then, Wiesel has written a procession of stately novels, from Night and The Town Beyond the Wall to A Beggar in Jerusalem.

I look forward to the second instalment of Wiesel's memoirs. But let us hope that Wiesel is more forthcoming about his inner life in this book than he has been in All Rivers Run to the Sea.

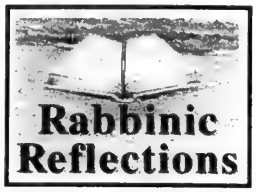
Two lessons of Purim



By RABBI LAWRENCE M. COLTON

Purim brings with it some very heavy baggage, indeed. Two separate and distinct lessons need to be emphasized as we celebrate Purim: one global, the other a personal and individual reminder for each and every Jew.

On the one hand, Purim's message for religious freedom in today's pluralistic society is not a message we ought to easily overlook. Religious pluralism is not merely a reality in modern life, but also an ideal to be cherished in a free society. Only pluralism can serve the needs of the emerging world community of the future.

On the other hand, separate and apart, Purim tells us something about the masks we all wear in an attempt to avoid confronting our own selves.

Purim is both a much needed political warning and a psychological self-assessment for our times.

So very often the lessons of the past fail to serve us well. We actually are capable of ignoring yesterday's stories so as to conceal our own uneasiness. The story of Purim, sadly, is a case in point. In the excitement to relate Purim to the young child of today, there is all too often the chance of highlighting the issues which only lead to merriment and play. The costumes of Purim override the lessons of Purim. The games played at a Purim carnival detract from the essence of a concept embedded in the holiday of Purim that begs our attention. We read in the secular newspaper of the rise in the number of hate crimes committed. We are reminded to be ever on the watch for the resurgence of bigotry and the vulgarity of prejudice. Yet we are uneasy with the message of Purim created to make precisely this point.

Purim speaks to the need for Jews never to seek to hide our identity, to always be prepared to defend our faith and to declare to the world that no one can be allowed to seek to destroy an entire people because of creed. The holiday of Purim was developed by our Jewish ancestors to deal with the problem, even then, of the acceptance of the Jewish people by non-Jews.

The Jewish people in the time of Queen Esther and her cousin Mordecai wanted to be accepted by the people amongst whom they lived, the Persians. Can a person successfully hide his or her identity? The Jews of Persia tried to disguise their Jewishness. We call this assimilation. The King did not know that Esther was Jewish and Esther and Mordecai did not want to tell him until Haman, who saw beneath their pretence, accused them of being different.

Rome was part of Toronto also

By BEN KAYFETZ
Special to The CJN

David Rome was born and spent his first 10 years in Vilna, the "Jerusalem of Lithuania." This tells us much about his love of books and writing, his attachment to Jewish culture, his search for deep roots in Canadian Jewish life and his overall ahavat Yisrael.

Guest Voices

When they came to America, his family settled, not on New York's East Side nor even in Montreal's "Main," but in the then sparsely populated (as far as Jews were concerned) city of Vancouver, the farthest west they could go in Canada. This may help us understand another facet in his character — his bridge-building, his search for mutual understanding with non-Jews that resulted in his acceptance in many quarters in and out of the Church and in the world of Québécois culture that many associated with unfriendliness and even hostility.

We are so accustomed to identifying Rome with Montreal that we forget he had a Toronto period — not lengthy, no more than one or two years — in the late 1930s or early 1940s, when he edited the English page of the Hebrew Daily Journal under another equally colorful journalist Shmuel-Meyer Shapiro. (Others who held this post were M.Z.R. Frank and Prof. Ben Lappin.)

But Montreal — then the cultural capital of Canadian Jewry — called and he moved eastward to take a job as press officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, working closely with Saul Hayes, Chanania Caiserman and Sam Bronfman, who had just taken on the leadership of Congress.

Part of Rome's job was editing the Congress Bulletin and therein lies a tale.

Montreal writer Ted Allen had promised Rome a short story for the Congress Bulletin. But he was late in delivering, even in writing it, because the complete story had not yet jelled in his mind. This was not good enough for Rome. The printer was waiting impatiently and time was of the essence. Besides which, he had promised Allen an honorarium of $10 (some versions say $5).

So Rome camped, not on Allen's doorstep, but in his very study, hovering and poking his head over Allen's shoulder, as the writer tapped out the words on his typewriter with Rome breathing hard down his neck, until finally the short story emerged.

This is how the Canadian classic — which became a movie — Lies My Father Told Me was born.

As a correspondent Rome was most unreliable when it came to answering letters. One might write him in January and not receive a reply until September. By that time, the point of the enquiry would frequently have been forgotten or would have rectified itself.

I personally regret that once settled in Montreal, Rome rarely came to Toronto even for plenary assemblies. It would have made for more stories of this eccentric but enjoyable and creative personality.

Rome's contribution to Canadian Jewish history was prodigious. His Clouds in the Thirties was a series of monographs on many aspects of Canadian Jewish history: the Achat Chez Nous movement, the Christie Pits riots in Toronto, the Adrien Arcand era, the anti-Jewish hospital strike of doctors in Montreal in 1934, the slanders against Archie Freiman of Ottawa.

And earlier periods were not neglected in the monographs on the Quebec Jewish school (including a special edition of documents related thereto); the story of a Jewish fighting editor Jules Helbronner, an Alsatian-born Jew who edited La Presse in the closing years of the last century; the influence of Reuven Brainin on the young Jewish intellectuals of the day; the Plamondon case, in which a judge ruled that racial group libel was actionable under certain conditions. And, best of all, the price was right — $5 per copy! (This writer cannot guarantee that these are still available).

Even in physical appearance and impact, Rome was out of the ordinary with his Puck-like physiognomy and his earnest, whispering speech.

Rome also prepared the Samuel Bronfman bibliography of writing by Jewish Canadians, scouring publishers' catalogues and reviews. He was a bibliophile, a researcher, a journalist, a librarian, an archivist, a historian, who like his older contemporaries B. G. Sack, Louis Rosenberg and Chanania Caiserman, helped Jews discover and understand themselves and their historic place in Canada.

Purim sites available on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In the story of Esther, King Achashverosh ruled over an immense empire "from India even unto Ethiopia." In order to deliver his royal decrees, messengers needed to travel for days to reach all of the King's 127 provinces.

Thanks to modern technology, news travels a bit quicker these days.

The Internet has a surprising number of Purim sites for you and your family to visit. By the time Purim starts on Monday night, you'll be able to travel the world for a wealth of information about the holiday that occurred in Persia over two millennia ago.

First of all, Purim is for kids. So take a look at [http://www.jer1.co.il/kids/]. There, you'll find Purim Stories and Purim Pictures which have been sent by children around the world via the Internet. For explanations about Purim's customs and traditions, visit [http://www.netvoyage.net/~brozen/ba/purim-links.html]. And for the historical context of the holiday, check out the World Zionist Organization essay at [gopher://gopher.jer1.co.il:70/00/Aliyah/junk/hol/pur/gi/purim].

If you want to brush up on Megillat Esther (and if your web browser can handle Hebrew), you can find the original at [http://snunit.huji.ac.il/snunit/kodesh/bible/mastr.html]. (We'll look at how to read Hebrew on the Internet in a future column.)

An English translation of Megillat Esther can be found at [http://www.spd.louisville.edu/~m0zaud01/holy/est.txt]. Please note this is the King James version.

For something a bit different, Britain's Union of Jewish Students takes a contemporary look at Female Role Models in the Megillah at [http://www.ed.ac.uk/~p92002/activist/purim.html]. Calgary's Eliezer Siegel continues the discussion in a fascinating article called Vashti: A Feminist Heroine. Siegel has more thought-provoking articles such as The War Against Purim and Purim, Parody and Pilpul. You can find their links at [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Purim].

What would Purim be without mishloach manot, the sending of ready-to-eat treats? Sure, nothing beats preparing your own basket, but if you want to send some goodies farther afield, you can have them delivered through the Jewish Highway!

I came across two web pages offering delivery of strictly kosher food to Israel. Although it's a bit late to send in your order, you might be interested to know that for $45 (US), an organization called Valued Israeli Products [http://www.cyberscribe.com:80/vip/] will send a friend or relative in Jerusalem the "Queen Esther Package ... overflowing with wine, Osem 10-pack soup, scrumptious treats like BBQ potato chips, plus an olivewood grogger." Bnei Akiva in New York [http://www.netvoyage.net/~brozen/ba/] also offers several baskets to Israel. And for an additional $10, they will send mishloach manot to a soldier in the Israeli army.

On a practical note, tradition teaches us that we are supposed to become so intoxicated on Purim that we are unable to distinguish any difference between "cursed is Haman" and "blessed is Mordecai." But what does that really mean? Kollel Menachem-Lubavitch of Melbourne, Australia, has an analysis at [http://www.shamash.org/judaica/havienu/ph-3.html].

And on an even more practical note: food. I haven't had a chance to try these out, but here are a couple of recipes for hamantashen. Robin Leidner's Liberation Hamentashen can be found at [http://haven.uniserve.com/~hostrov/recipe.html]. Robin's recipe calls for Lekvar or prune butter. You can also try Fruit-filled Hamantashen from Philadelphia at [http://www.epicurious.com/db/recipes/recipesH/3/40013.html].

Sorry poppy seed hamantashen lovers, I couldn't find an on-line recipe for you. Maybe next year.

Have a Happy Purim.

Lesson of history is clear

The lesson of history to our people is clear. No matter how much the Jewish people tried to demonstrate that they were like everyone else, a Haman came along to denounce them for being different and to seek their destruction because of that difference. Purim celebrates the miracle of Jewish survival.

History also records an all-consuming fascination with the faces we wear, some God given, others the masks we put on. Inherent in the story of Purim, there is a hidden meaning behind the masks each notable character wears: Haman's mask makes him appear authoritative and self-confident; Achashverosh, lusty and exhilarating; Vashti, stunning and beautiful; Esther, quiet, unsure and fearful; and Mordecai, devoted and loyal.

Contrary to the facade presented by these masks, however, Haman wears underneath his the reality of false pride and vainglory. He is in love with himself and destructively self-defeating. Beneath his mask, Achashverosh represents the paradigm of male chauvinism. Vashti is strong-willed and determined not to be anyone's slave, no matter the cost. Esther is made strong by fierce loyalties to heritage, people and family; and Mordecai is exceedingly humble.

If blind ambition is Haman's fault, then enlightened caring is Mordecai's virtue. If unchecked ego is Haman's downfall, then controlled outrage upon overhearing a grievous wrong is Mordecai's reward. Vashti strikes a blow for the propriety of the feminist's position in the midst of an old boys' network. Esther achieves a degree of bravery. Achashverosh redeems himself by swift action.

The Purim story could be entitled The Masks We Wear. Consider the masks that each of us wears every day. What we see is not necessarily who we are. Eventually, these masks are always torn away and as in The Book of Esther our true selves are revealed.

Purim is a holiday of tremendous impact for the world at large and, at the same time, for each and every Jew.

Are alimony agreements becoming meaningless?

PART 3 OF 3

Further to our discussion (Feb. 1 and 15) of Madame Justice L'Heureux-Dubé's minority decision suggesting that the Court could overturn a supposedly "final" alimony agreement it deems unfair, she also ruled as follows: if the payer spouse's standard of living improves, then the former spouse may have to be paid more support, notwithstanding a "binding" agreement that says otherwise.

All of this may be revolutionary. The majority decision of the Supreme Court written by Mr. Justice Sopinka appears to disagree with the need to make such new policy statements in this case, although he does not say that Madame Justice L'Heureux-Dubé is wrong. In my view, Sopinka correctly limited his decision to the facts of this particular case. (A man was obliged to continue support payments to his wife even though she continued to live with her lover, because when the contract was signed, both parties ought to have foreseen that the lover would cohabit with her.) Sopinka is right: this was not the appropriate case to review the general law of the binding nature of alimony agreements, particularly since even the majority of the Court upheld the agreement in this case! There was no need on the facts to suggest that such agreements can be ignored, since the Court did not do so with the agreement before it.

More importantly, if an alimony contract can be now be ignored because it wasn't "fair", then lawyers cannot advise payer clients to sign such agreements without a written acknowledgment from the client that, in the proper case, a Court can ignore the deal. Otherwise, lawyers open themselves to liability from former male clients who may come back later and say: "Hey, what the hell did I pay you for? She's now coming after me again. And it's your fault because the agreement doesn't protect me. You must now pay what I've been ordered to pay by the Court as a result of your negligence." In short, lawyers become insurers in a risky game. I'd rather take my chances in Vegas or Windsor. It's more fun.

Anyone who is now about to get married or even to cohabit may become an automatic pension plan to a dependent spouse, even in the face of a marriage contract. And anyone who contemplates settling their spouse's alimony claim could be fooling themselves if they think it's legally over, unless the agreement is drafted with this case in mind. Even then, there may no longer be any finality to such claims. It is my view that Madame Justice L'Heureux-Dubé's minority decision is a grave disincentive to settle alimony claims and that it may ultimately promote more litigation. Many lawyers would rather have a Court impose a support order than now become financial "guarantors" for negotiating releases that could be meaningless.

Anti-racism program an eye-opener for students

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anti-Racism Awareness Week at Newtonbrook Secondary School was more successful than some students would have predicted, given their reactions to one of the first events of last week's program.

An 18-year-old girl admitted that she had "expected to fall asleep" during a talk by Alan Borovoy of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

Another student went into the presentation "expecting to hear a cliche, that racism is bad."

Instead, the 10 OAC (final-year) students who met with The CJN immediately following the lecture found themselves quoting snippets of Borovoy's speech and trying to assimilate some new ideas.

"It gave me a different perspective," said Jaime Gomez, a Canadian-born student of Colombian extraction. "I never really thought of [racism] jobwise. I always thought of the bigot you had to fight."

It's not necessarily bigots who pose the problem, Borovoy had explained. "It's easier to get worked up about a handful of creeps who preach hate. To be sure, we have to be concerned about them, but ... the major emphasis of our activities [regarding discriminatory employment practices] should be on those who ... are polite, who don't insult, but nevertheless are not hiring enough members of minority groups."

Equity and fair play must take precedence over racial harmony, Borovoy stressed. Although he wouldn't want anyone to think he's "opposed" to racial harmony, he said, his prime goal is to root out inappropriate behavior.

Canadian law prohibits discrimination against employees, customers and tenants, he noted.

Human Rights Commission inquiries into discrimination cases are designed to inconvenience offenders to the extent that they will conclude it makes sense to change their practices, Borovoy explained, adding that the commission is "hopelessly backlogged."

Even people who don't act in a discriminatory manner can pose serious problems when they fail to condemn racist behavior, he emphasized.

"They won't make a fuss if their organization honors a racist. They won't sign a petition. They won't stand up and protest. This doesn't mean they're all racists. This means they're not willing to pay the price to fight racism."

Borovoy's description of "well-intentioned non-doers" rang in the ears of several students, including Keyvan Parvaneh, who once attended a school where "you'd never see a white person and an Indian person talking."

Although a quick look in the Newtonbrook cafeteria indicates that students are clustered with others from like backgrounds, Dorsa Jabbari, whose background, like Parvaneh's, is Iranian, said that her group of longtime friends includes two blacks, a Greek and someone from China. Nor is she friendly with all of the Iranian students, she added.

Alan Borovoy

Among the school's 1,800 students are blacks and Orientals, as well as a substantial Jewish population, including recently arrived Russians and Israelis.

None of the students interviewed had experienced discrimination themselves, they said, although they have encountered ignorance.

Other events last week included talks by anti-racist consultant Carol Tator and Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Temple Har Zion gets award

TORONTO — Temple Har Zion received the Irving J. Fain Award, in honor of its social action program, at the Union of American Hebrew Congregations' (UAHC) 63rd biennial convention in Atlanta.

Breaking the Circle of Hate will be featured in the 1995 Guide to Congregational Social Action Programs distributed to more than 850 Reform congregations.

The program was designed by Arieh Cohen, chair of the temple's social action committee, and Fran Issacs, to sensitize the congregation's youth to anti-Semitism and racism.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president-elect of the UAHC, emphasized the importance of such programming: "We will refuse to abandon the quest for justice which lies at the heart of our religious institutions; and we will remember, too, that tikkun olam is why we study Torah and why we perform mitzvot."

Temple Har Zion's Breaking the Circle of Hate was selected from among nearly 80 social action programs across the United States and Canada.

For more information about the program, contact Cohen at 416-787-9469 or Issacs at 905-881-2383.

Future Bakery is a family-run business.
It all started with my Polish grandfather who was a master baker in the court of the Russian Czar Nicholas. In 1952 he and my Ukranian grandmother moved to Canada and started future Bakery. They were looking forward to the "Future" in their new country!
Today my father and I run the bakery and we still use my grandparents' recipies.
So the next time you eat at future, you'll see why it is more than just another bakery!

Community loses two leaders

'Uncle Max' dedicated to Mizrachi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Max Zeifman, a prominent leader of Toronto's religious Zionist community, died on Feb. 20. He was 85.

Friends and family, who knew him affectionately as "Uncle Max," speak of his kindness, warmth and friendliness, referring to him as a rodef sholom, a peacemaker.

A familiar figure at community functions, he was passionately dedicated to Mizrachi, to which he had belonged since his youth, and to Israel.

Zeifman was born in Stopnitz, Poland, and came to Canada in 1927 as a teenager. He worked as a cutter in his brother's fur shop until 1954, when he started his own business, Maxwell Construction Co.

In 1972, he retired and devoted the rest of his life to charitable causes. He worked assiduously for the Jewish National Fund, United Jewish Appeal, Israel Bonds, the Central Fund and hospitals and yeshivot here and in Israel.

But his primary allegiance was to Mizrachi. Rabbi Menachem Gopin, executive director of Mizrachi of Canada, called him "a walking, talking spokesperson for Mizrachi projects in Israel."

Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, called him a "prince of a man," who could make friends with people of all ages and all backgrounds.

Rabbis Dratch and Gopin described how Zeifman continued his fundraising efforts even when he was in the hospital recovering from a stroke.

His son Sol said that his father was a Sabbath observer his whole life, working until the last possible minute on Fridays and going back to work as soon as possible Saturday night.

"He ran after mitzvot, going to funerals and shivah houses, going to shul every day after he retired, and either donating to charity himself or encouraging others to donate."

One of the highlights of his life, Rabbi Gopin said, was the dedication in 1993 of a sefer Torah in his honor to Shaarei Shomayim by the synagogue and Mizrachi.

Rabbi Henry Hoschander, former rabbi of Shaarei Shomayim, said, "He was not a kovod (glory) seeker. He was one of the most unique individuals in our community."

Zeifman was predeceased by his wife Lilly. He is survived by his children Esther, Sol and Lonni, and four grandchildren.

Finkler helped out BIU causes

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leona Finkler, a powerhouse volunteer and fundraiser in Toronto's Jewish community for many years, died Feb. 20 while vacationing in Miami Beach, after a long illness. She was 77.

The eulogy at last week's funeral was delivered by Rabbi Emmanuel Rackman, chancellor of Bar-Ilan University, one of the main causes supported by the Finklers.

Among the most lasting legacies of Finkler and her husband Arnold, who died in 1989, was the Marilyn Finkler Cancer Research Centre on Bar-Ilan's campus, named for their daughter, who died of cancer in 1975 at age 19.

The state-of-the art, $2-million facility was opened in 1987 to enable Israeli scientists to explore new therapies for cancer and AIDS. Researchers there developed a substance known as AS-101, which lessens the toxicity of other drugs used to fight AIDS and cancer.

Born in Plock, Poland, Finkler survived eight concentration camps, but lost 80 members of her family in the camps, including her first husband, a physician, at Auschwitz.

She returned to Poland after the war, but widespread pogroms there drove her to Germany, where she worked for Aliya Bet, the clandestine organization that spirited Jews to Palestine. She was reunited with Arnold, a one-time patient of her husband, whom she had met in one of the camps.

The Finklers came to Canada in 1948, penniless but determined to help others. Those values were passed onto their two daughters. Patty Friedland went on to become president of the Baycrest Centre's women's auxiliary (as her mother had been), while Marilyn was once arrested for chaining herself to a fence to protest the treatment of Soviet Jews.

Leona Finkler served as president of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and vice-president of the university's international board of trustees; chaired the women's division of State of Israel Bonds; and was active in the Jewish National Fund and Hadassah-WIZO.

She is survived by her daughter and son-in-law Patty and Allan Friedland; grandchildren Jeffrey and Marla; brother Ben Lant and sister-in-law Sonia; and sister Irene Goldkorn.

לכל איש יש שם

De Villiers says society must target youth violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Violence against women is a plague as bad as any that has ever threatened our world, says Priscilla de Villiers, whose 21-year-old daughter Nina was abducted and murdered in Burlington in 1991.

"We are told that Canada is no worse than any other place, but is that a comfort when youth violence is escalating? The greatest number of victims of youth are other youth and they are our future citizens," she said recently at the second annual Women for Women breakfast, entitled Violence is Everywhere ... How Safe are Women, sponsored by Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

Through its Women for Women campaign, Hadassah-WIZO supports shelters for battered women, 24-hour hotlines, rape crisis centres, legal advice bureaus and information centres in Israel.

De Villiers is the president and driving force behind CAVEAT, (Canadians Against Violence Everywhere Advocating Its Termination), an organization whose mission is to contribute to the creation and maintenance of a just and safe society by public education, advocating changes to the justice system and ensuring the rights of victims.

When she immigrated from South Africa, she said, "I felt like I had escaped from prison, but 17 years later we are imprisoning ourselves behind locked doors and burglar alarms. We are not winning the battle, but the wonderful thing about Canada is that it is still possible to win some of the battle.

"We cannot sit back and continue to believe that the system will take care of us, because since my daughter's death, I have found an extraordinary lack of concern for human lives. The frailty of life is treated in a very casual fashion — the sentences of men who shoot or stab their wives at home are ludicrous. The terrible truth is that at the moment, it is still a rarity for the Bernardos or the Olsons to create crimes, crimes are happening at home or at school," she said.

She said that to suggest there is one victim of any crime is an oversimplification.

"When Nina died, everyone in Burlington was a victim. Wherever I go, someone tells me how they reacted to my tragedy. Nina was a victim, but the whole community has suffered. We are all potential victims of violence."

De Villiers said that a big problem is that youth violence is not being targeted enough. "Why are we not putting in as many preventive measures as we can at that level so the people who do slip through are the minority? The bulk of our work is trying to use our clout to put services in place to deal with disturbed children and to help communities to help themselves. Human life is our most precious commodity and we must preserve it at all costs."

The liar fools himself most of all when he imagines that people believe him.

The Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University and the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation invite you to a lecture by
DR. HAIM SOLOVEITCHIK
University Professor of Jewish History and Literature, Bernard Revel Graduate School and
Professor of Jewish Law,
Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law
Yeshiva University, New York on the subject
Rupture and Reconstruction: The Transformation of Contemporary Jewry
Sunday, March 10, 1996 at 8:00 p.m. at the
Shaarei Shomayim Congregation
470 Glencairn Avenue, Toronto

Professor Soloveitchik, son of the late unique Torah giant of our age, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, is in his own right an outstanding scholar and author. His theme will provide a provocative and stimulating exploration of a major phenomenon within modern Jewish life.

Dr. Soloveitchik's lecture will be based on his seminal essay of the same name in the Summer 1994 edition of Tradition magazine. Those planning to attend are asked to read his article, copies of which are available at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

London teen chess champ plays Spassky to a draw

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

LONDON — Liat Dobrishman, an Israeli-born public school student, was the youngest player to earn a draw with former world chess champion Boris Spassky at a match here in Westmount Mall. Spassky played 24 opponents simultaneously.

Liat Dobrishman playing 16 games simultaneously.

Liat, 13, a student in Grade 8 at Northridge Public School, teaches chess at Temple Israel where her family are members. She won the title for her age group at the Canadian Open Chess championship in London two years ago.

Liat's first chess teacher was her grandfather, Itzhak, who also lives in London. Her father, Lazar, a supervisor at Concord Elevators, and a part-time Hebrew teacher at Temple Israel, plays a little chess, but her mother, Riva, does not play at all.

The Dobrishmans were married in Russia and lived in Israel for 17 years in Rehovot, where Lazar was a physics and math teacher. Liat was eight when the family moved to Canada. The Dobrishmans also have a son, Yaakov, 28

"The house is full of trophies, cups and medals she won in chess tournaments," said her mother.

Liat plays the piano and is a good student, in addition to her chess wizardry. "One day she says she would like to be a teacher, and another day she wants to be a translator," her mother said. "I don't know what it will be tomorrow."

VANCOUVER — The Jewish National Fund (JNF) Pacific region's Negev Dinner takes on a different twist this year. Instead of having an honoree, the dinner will pay tribute to the city of Jerusalem "for 3,000 years the heart and soul of the Jewish people and the capital of the State of Israel."

The dinner is scheduled for March 31 at the Four Seasons Hotel. Guest speaker will be Moshe Rivlin, world chair of the JNF since 1977.

Funds raised will go towards a park to be built by the JNF in an undeveloped section in the southwestern part of Jerusalem. It is to include a huge outdoor amphitheatre and recreation site, and is expected to accommodate up to 40,000 people.

Dinner funds will also help the Gan Yaldei Yisrael (Israel children's garden) in the Jerusalem Peace Forest, a green belt in a more central part of the city.

Jack Diamond, 1991 honoree, will serve as honorary dinner chair, with past regional chair Norman Gold as dinner committee chair.

Entertainment will be provided by DuDu Fisher, an Israeli TV star, who began his singing career as a cantor and has performed lead roles in Tel Aviv and London, and on Broadway. In 1989, he gave a command performance in the lead role of Les Miserables for Queen Elizabeth II.

Fisher has recorded 14 albums of cantorial, Israeli and Yiddish music, and will be playing the lead in Phantom of the Opera in London.

Mel Sprackman will be master of ceremonies at the dinner and members of the committee include Naomi Frankenburg, national chair of Jerusalem 3000, and Gary Averbach, Bonnie Belzberg, Harvey Dales, Ruth Freeman, Bill Gruenthal, Shirley Schwartz and Irving Sirlin.

Multicultural diversity helps makes Canada a top country, says Fry

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Canada is rated as one of the best countries to live in and part of that reputation stems from the diversity of the population, the cosmopolitan nature of the cities and "our willingness to contribute collectively to the essence of being Canadian," says Hedy Fry, federal secretary of state for multiculturalism.

Recently appointed to her ministerial post, Fry, a Vancouver MP, spoke at the proclamation of Multiculturalism Week in British Columbia, Feb. 18 to 24.

Canada believes strongly "in equality of opportunity, of citizen participation, contribution and partnership, not only as a matter of justice and fairness but of necessity, as we evolve as a nation and as we build a strong Canadian society," she said.

Multiculturalism "is an instrument of positive change in our society," she said. Multiculturalism is not about creating or encouraging differences. It is about "removing barriers of discrimination and misunderstanding, which stand in the way of acceptance and mutual respect. It is about fostering a sense of belonging and demonstrating how Canada's diversity is part of our strength."

Under the Charter of Rights and the Constitution, Canada is a country which embraces cultural, linguistic and regional diversity, she stressed. "We are all equal under the law, no matter if we are native born or naturalized Canadians like myself."

Fry pledged full support in the task of promoting racial harmony and the acceptance of other cultures in the community.

Multiculturalism Week was proclaimed officially by Ujal Dosanjh, the B.C. multicultural minister, and by Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen.

Election a battle of peace patriots

"The election is a battle between the patriots of peace and the protectors of national survival."

Looking to the future, he said, "Israel is going to need all the help it can get from the Diaspora. I fundamentally reject the notion that we don't need the Diaspora. We are going into the most difficult diplomatic period in our history."

Canadians have an important role to play in lobbying the government to support Israel's position in coming negotiations, said Marty Goldberg, president, Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

Leukemia patients to benefit from Roifman's efforts

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When he was a child in Israel, Dr. Chaim Roifman never had to choose what he wanted to do when he grew up. He always knew he wanted to be a doctor and to be involved in science.

Canada, and indeed the world, will now benefit from Roifman's dedication.

Head of the Immunology and Allergy Division at the Hospital for Sick Children and associate professor of pediatrics at the University of Toronto, he and his research team have developed a promising treatment for acute lymphoblastic leukemia, the most common form of childhood cancer.

Roifman explained to The CJN in a recent interview that for some eight to 10 years, research has been going on to try to find what prevents immune cells from growing (causing the so-called bubble babies, who have no immune system at all) and conversely, what causes cancer cells to grow without any control at all.

"We hypothesized that there must be a series of enzymes responsible for signalling the cells to grow [properly] that might have mutated in some way to cause either of these conditions."

The research conducted at the Hospital for Sick Children found that the enzyme Jak-2, which acts as a transmitter of cell growth signals, is overabundant and abnormally active in recurrent leukemia cells. This, a hospital media release noted, causes the leukemia cells to reproduce uncontrollably.

The next step was to try to isolate a compound which could block Jak-2's functioning. Very recently, research in mice proved that AG-490, a compound prepared by Drs. Alexander Levitzki and Aviv Gazit of the Hebrew University, blocked Jak-2 and killed leukemia cells, while not affecting other enzymes.

AG-490, then, Roifman said, appears very promising as a cure for acute lymphoblastic leukemia, as well as for other kinds of cancers.

When the research team realized that their work had been successful, "there was tremendous excitement," he said.

"For a year and a half, this group of dedicated people didn't come to work — they came to a mission. They came early, stayed late and worked weekends. They had a sense that they were achieving something important."

The task now is to create and test AG-490 on humans, a monumental effort that may take as long as five years and $10 to $15 million.

Roifman is not prepared to sit back and wait for the government to provide research funds.

"There is no doubt that there has been a dramatic decrease in government funding. Governments now don't have the means — they have other priorities," he said. "When people are laid off work, welfare has been cut and people have day to day needs, we can't complain about less research funding."

The scientific community has to be more aggressive in soliciting industry and direct community support, he said, noting that he had so far received grants from the Medical Research Council, from a drug company and from the Reichman family.

Dr. Chaim Roifman

"We should never give up the dream of doing excellent research," he said.

"Real breakthroughs start with a dream. If a young person has a dream and is determined to achieve that goal, sometimes it's not the ultimate achievement, but the trip that gives meaningful satisfaction in your life. It's nice to get to what you want to achieve, but the real thrill is the years of doing something you actually want to do."

Roifman gives credit to his wife Perach, a Hebrew teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and his three children, for his accomplishments.

"Without the support of an excellent wife, I wouldn't have gotten where I am. My children sacrificed as well. For the past 10 years, they saw little of me. I think they felt that I was doing some work that might be worth that sacrifice. But I suppose I will always feel guilty about that."

Another strong influence on his life, Roifman said, is the fact that he is the child of Holocaust survivors, who attended school in Israel and served in the army there.

"Is there a link between being the child of survivors and the tenacity to achieve mixed with Israeli chutzpah that leads to another level, a higher level? You tell me."

Suicide terrorists heighten security concerns

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The ability of Israel and the Palestinian Authority to prevent attacks by Islamic extremists has been thrown into question by this week's twin suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Ashkelon.

The bombings — the bloodiest since Israel and the Palestinians signed the historic Declaration of Principles in September 1993 — left questions about how both sides handle security, the peace process' raison d'etre for many Israelis.

Sunday's attacks came only days after Israel lifted the closure it imposed Feb. 12 on the West Bank and Gaza Strip in the wake of reports that Hamas was planning to avenge the Jan. 5 Gaza Strip killing of master bombmaker Yehiya Ayyash, also known as ``The Engineer.''

Israeli officials, who neither confirmed nor denied Hamas allegations that the Jewish state was behind Ayyash's death, began easing the closure Feb. 15 to allow Palestinians older than 30 to return to their jobs in Israel. The closure was lifted entirely last Friday.

The deadly bombings — which struck a bus in the heart of Jerusalem and a soldiers' hitchhiking station near Ashkelon, killing 27 people and wounding more than 50 — came after security sources had warned not only about the possibility that militants would avenge Ayyash's death, but that they also would mark the second anniversary of the slaying of 29 Palestinian worshipers at a Hebron mosque by Jewish settler Dr. Baruch Goldstein.

But in the aftermath of the bombings, the Israel Defence Force chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, dismissed suggestions that Israeli security forces should have been more alert in the wake of the lifting of the closure.

"If it wasn't the 50th day [since Ayyash's death] it would have been the 60th," he told reporters. " Hamas does not need excuses.

"It has declared that it will act against us."

Police Commissioner Assaf Hefetz likewise said security and political measures were being taken to combat terrorism, adding that the lifting of the closure and Sunday's attacks were not necessarily linked.

"Just because there was an attack immediately after the lifting of the closure does not mean it was because it was lifted," he told Israel Radio.

In the Jerusalem attack on a No. 18 bus, a suicide bomber with a 22-pound bomb filled with nails and ball bearings killed 23 people and wounded at least 50 others, 10 of them seriously. Two Americans were among those killed.

The attack came during Israel's early morning rush hour, as the bus waited at a traffic light at Jaffa and Sarei Yisrael streets, some 900 feet from the central bus station.

The blast destroyed the bus, leaving only a blackened, twisted frame. It damaged another local bus, No. 36, which was waiting behind it, as well as seven cars near the blast.

The second attack occurred in Ashkelon, less than an hour later, at a hitchhiking stop for soldiers.

The suicide bomber in that attack killed two people and wounded 29, including six who were in serious condition.

The attack was reportedly carried out by a terrorist dressed in an Israeli army uniform who mingled with soldiers waiting for rides.

The attacks came after a six-month halt by Hamas, which last attacked an Israeli target August 21, when a suicide bomber detonated an explosion on the No. 26 bus in Jerusalem's northern neighborhood of Ramat Eshkol, killing four people.

Sunday's bombings generated questions about the Palestinian Authority's ability to control Hamas terrorists.

Israeli intelligence officials briefing the Cabinet on Sunday repeated their assessment that the Palestinian Authority was not doing enough to get at the infrastructure of Hamas and the other fundamentalist groups.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres, briefing reporters after Sunday's attacks, said he had telephoned Palestinian Council President Yasser Arafat and demanded that the Palestinian Authority stop the militants from carrying out their deadly missions.

Not a time for politics, says Likud leader

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu issued a statement calling on Likud activists to refrain from holding demonstrations for the next two days, out of respect for the period of national mourning.

"On the day of such a terrible disaster, when terror strikes at the heart of Jerusalem and Ashkelon, it is fitting to unite the people in mourning and express the hope of achieving real peace and security. We won't enter into a political battle on a day like today. This is a day for uniting the ranks and that's how we'll act," Netanyahu said.

The National Religious Party (NRP) called on all parties to "refrain from turning this terrible tragedy into political currency."

"At this difficult time of sorrow and suffering, political criticism should not be sharpened," said NRP leader Zevulun Hammer. "Blown-up buses and dismembered bodies cannot serve as fuel for the primary election races."

Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan said the attacks "proved that Prime Minister Shimon Peres does not know how to fight this murderous terror and is leading the country to an impossible and false peace with terrorists, with encouragement from Meretz." He called for an unlimited closure of the territories.

MK Hanan Porat (NRP) called on Peres not to give up control of Hebron and the surrounding areas, from which, he said, terrorist cells operate.

MK David Levy, leader of the newly formed Gesher party, called on Peres to halt the talks with the Palestinians until they prove they are dealing with the Hamas and Islamic Jihad terror infrastructure.

"When there was no partner and no peace process, you could say this was the price. When there is a partner and he knows of the existence of this terror infrastructure, the government must put him to the test. You can't keep saying again and again, in the name of peace, that this is the price," Levy said.

Moledet leader Rehavam Ze'evi criticized the government for lifting the closure on Friday, saying it only invited the terrorists to attack. "If the government says it is stopping the talks, it is only to keep the public quiet by showing it has done something. The talks on selling Jerusalem will go on far from here in Europe," he said.

He called for an immediate closure of the territories, a halt to the "false peace process and the giving away of Eretz Yisrael to terrorists. The terror won't stop. Unless we sober up, this is not the last bus to explode."

Meretz canceled its primaries, scheduled for yesterday. "We can't just go on as if it were business as usual," said party leader Yossi Sarid.

Speaker Shevah Weiss issued a statement in the name of the Knesset expressing "deep shock and condemnation," condolences to the families of the dead and wishes for the speedy recovery of the injured.

The Knesset marked a day of mourning on Monday.

U.S. to press Arafat to fight terrorism

By HILLEL KUTTLER and DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Clinton administration indicated last Sunday that it is dissatisfied with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's efforts to crack down on terrorism, and it is increasing pressure on him to do so.

Messages and calls of condolences poured into the Prime Minister's Office, with Arafat being the first to phone.

In public remarks, Arafat said the attack was an assault against the entire peace process: "This is not a military operation. This is a terrorist operation. I condemn it completely. It is not against only civilians, but against the whole peace process. I send my condolences to the families of the victims and to Prime Minister Shimon Peres."

In a statement offering condolences to the families of the victims, President Bill Clinton said that such acts "must not only be condemned, they must be brought to an end."

In his statement, Clinton called the bombings "brutal acts of terror" that "offend the conscience of the world."

Speaking to reporters before heading to Britain on a private visit, Jordan's King Hussein said, "My feeling is one of bitterness and disgust. It's an effort to blow up the peace process and derail it, and its victims are innocent people here and there," he said.

Both Jordan's Crown Prince Hassan and Prime Minister Karim Abdul Kabiriti also contacted Peres and publicly deplored the attack. Kabiriti then made a call to Arafat and urged him to do everything possible against terror.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak also called Peres, offering his condolences. British Prime Minister John Major cabled Peres, noting that London has also suffered terrorism in recent days, but that Israel should not be deterred from peace.

Condolence messages were also sent by the foreign ministers of France, the Netherlands, Norway, and Cyprus.

'Stunned by the daring and the capability'

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Security officials said they were not surprised by the twin attacks, but were stunned by the daring and capability of the terrorists.

"They have advanced another step," said Karmi Gillon, former head of the General Security Service (GSS).

Gillon told Channel 1 that the number of terror attacks has dropped by 70 percent since Yasser Arafat's arrival in Gaza, and that since April 1995, Arafat has done substantially more, foiling several terror attacks. He cited cooperation between Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) security apparatus as a positive factor, while admitting that Israel's own intelligence network has been hurt following the IDF's pullout from population centres in the territories.

At the same time, he echoed the assessment of Brig.-Gen. Ya'acov Amidror, deputy chief of IDF Intelligence, who told the cabinet Sunday that Arafat has yet to "root out the terrorist infrastructure."

The infrastructure is critical, as it takes many people to perform a variety of tasks before a suicide bomber blows himself up, Gillon said.

The question, officials said, is whether Hamas regards the bombings as a settling of scores for the assassination of Yehiye Ayyash or whether the success would prompt a wave of attacks.

Security officials had expected Hamas to retaliate for the assassination of Ayyash in January, despite a PA pledge to prevent terrorism. Israel imposed a closure on the territories for most of the past seven weeks to prevent the attacks promised by Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

But as time went on, security sources said, political pressure to lift the closure increased. Officials dealing with the Palestinians warned of heightened tensions unless Arab laborers were allowed in to work.

Security officials were embarrassed by the insistence of government leaders that they recommend the lifting of the closure last Friday, a move that some sources maintain resulted in the decision by Hamas to send in the suicide bombers. Some officials, particularly in the police and GSS, asserted that they consistently opposed lifting the closure, but their influence is limited.

The assessment of security sources is that the suicide bombers were probably ordered to attack at a suitable site closest to the Green Line, to avoid delay and possible detection. Hamas agents were said to have prepared the bombs and funding for the operation weeks ago, but waited for the recruitment of the suicide attackers as well as the right date — the second anniversary of the Machpelah massacre.

Some security officials said that the seven-month lull in suicide bombings represented more of a Hamas decision to lower its profile rather than the ability of the authorities to eliminate the terrorist network.

They acknowledged that despite the PA's success in foiling several suicide bombers, Palestinian forces have left Hamas's military organization intact.

This includes the support system to recruit suicide bombers and other attackers, and the money to pay them and their families and to obtain the guns and explosives needed.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres acknowledged that at the urging of the GSS, he asked PA President Yasser Arafat to arrest a list of suspected Hamas terrorist leaders, including followers of Ayyash, who were planning a new outrage. Arafat, the security sources said, did nothing.

More Hamas murders

And more quietly. There were no massive demonstrations. Opposition party leaders called for restraint, not wishing to rekindle the ugly protests that preceded Yitzhak Rabin's murder. But it's not clear that they had to make this plea at all. Many Israelis seemed to be looking inward.

On a Tel Aviv-Jerusalem bus, there was a hushed silence as the radio carried updates of the death toll. Only one passenger broke the silence and sobbed out loud.

"People feel despair," says Israel Harel, a right-wing commentator. "They feel there is nothing they can do."

"People have just sobered up," counters Prof. Shlomo Ben-Ami, a Labor party candidate. "They recognize that there is no simple solution to the problem."

And maybe they are just numb. There is a dulling sense of deja vu after the 13th suicide bombing in two years. There is a predictable series of rituals that follow each attack.

The radio plays a familiar selection of melancholy music between the updates on the number of dead and wounded.

The schools observe a minute of silence, followed by a special discussion with students. For some children, it is already the fourth or fifth such talk. Many are too frightened to take buses.

And on Monday morning, the front pages of the major dailies display the faces of the dead. Most of the victims of the attacks in Jerusalem and Ashkelon are under 21 years old. The bombers prefer Sunday because the buses are packed with young soldiers returning to their bases after the weekend.

The rows of youthful faces are a reminder of other Sunday attacks like the one at Beit Lid.

This time, it's a 19-year-old girl who was to be married in the summer. Instead of a wedding, her mother is planning her funeral. This time, it's a journalist who shows up at the site of the bombing, not knowing that his son is buried somewhere beneath the rubble. This time, it's a widow who loses her only child. Another 27 faces. Another Black Sunday.

LEONA FINKLER ז"ל

Bar-Ilan University in Israel and its American Friends mourn the passing of one of the most committed leaders in its 40 year history, Dr. Leona Finkler. She, and her beloved husband, Arnold, were honorary alumni of our university. Both were members of the Global Board of Trustees and chairpersons of the Canadian Friends. At Bar-Ilan, they established one of the first Institutes for Holocaust Studies in the world, which proudly bears their name. They also built the Marilyn Finkler Memorial for Research on Cancer and AIDS and the celebrated "Hall of Rights" in the Emanuel Rackman Law Center. However, while these gifts attest to their generosity and self sacrifice, they cannot possibly convey the love that they generated, the friendships they inspired and the concern that was theirs for humanity in general and Jews and Judaism in particular.

To Patricia Friedland, their surviving daughter, and her beloved husband, Allan, we extend our condolences. Patricia is a member of our Global Board and with her and Allan we will continue to build and fashion a school in the image of her parents. This is the challenge of our present bereavement. May we all derive solace from inspiring memories and continue in our work together in G-d's vineyard

ELECTION NOTEBOOK

Sarid Elected Meretz Leader

JERUSALEM — Environment Minister Yossi Sarid was unanimously elected Meretz chairman by the movement's 900 council members last week.

The council also bid farewell to outgoing chairman Shulamit Aloni, who is retiring from political life after 31 years in the Knesset. Aloni officially announced she would not set up an independent party, and led Meretz leaders to believe they could count on her support in the election campaign.

Levy Launches New Gesher Party

JERUSALEM — Last week MK David Levy officially launched his new party, Gesher (Bridge). He announced that after the elections he will be a partner to any Labor or Likud government that accepts Gesher's principles.

Presenting his new party at a press conference in Tel Aviv's Beit Sokolow, Levy dismissed surveys predicting him winning two to three mandates, stating that "according to our surveys, we have a potential of 20 percent of the undecided voters, which means seven to 10 mandates.

"Mark my words: No new government will be formed without us," Levy declared.

Foreign Leaders May Be Asked To Stay Home

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry is weighing whether to ask foreign dignitaries to delay their trips here until after the elections to avoid a diplomatic confrontation over visits to Orient House, Foreign Ministry officials indicated.

It is possible that even in the absence of an explicit Foreign Ministry appeal, foreign officials would decide not to visit during the election campaign, should Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal ban visits to Orient House.

Candidates' List Causes Row In Likud Party

JERUSALEM — Likud officials charged the Israeli media last week with exaggerating a reported rift in the party between leader Benjamin Netanyahu and Knesset member Dan Meridor.

Reports of the rift came in the wake of the publication this week of a list of recommended Likud candidates in the primaries, which did not include Meridor or Knesset member Ehud Olmert, the mayor of Jerusalem.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 19

• The Arrow II anti-tank missile was successfully test-launched, yet again, in Israel. American officials in charge of the missile's development, were on hand for the test.

• Interior Minister Haim Ramon announced that he intends to approve the construction of 6,500 apartment units in the Har Homa neighborhood in southern Jerusalem.

Feb. 20

• Knesset members from religious parties complied with an appeal by Justice Minister David Libai to postpone a vote on legislation governing Jewish conversions.

• Deputy Defence Minister Ori Orr said that the redeployment of the IDF from parts of Hebron will be carried out according to the date specified in the Interim Agreement and will not be linked to the date of Knesset elections.

Feb. 21

• The date for elections was finally settled as May 29.

• Davar Rishon reported that Yasser Arafat is likely to agree to a request from Israel that the resumption of talks on a "final status" peace agreement be delayed until after the Israeli elections.

Feb. 22

• Yediot Aharonot reported that a cooperation agreement between the IDF and the Turkish army would be signed in Israel during the visit of Turkey's chief of staff. The visit came on the eve of the formation of a new coalition government in Turkey, which includes an extremist Muslim party.

Feb. 23

• Friday's Yediot Aharonot poll reported that Prime Minister Shimon Peres enjoys 49 percent support among the electorate compared to 34 percent for Benjamin Netanyahu and five percent for David Levy.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• More than 5,000 people were expected to attend the Conference of the International Christian Embassy held in Jerusalem throughout the week.

Arafat condemns bombings; sends his condolences

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat condemned the bombings as "terrorist operations" and sent his condolences to the Israeli people. But is he himself doing enough to stop terror?

Foreign Minister Ehud Barak and former General Security Service head Karmi Gillon said Sunday that Arafat's police have prevented at least five attacks, but he has failed to dismantle the infrastructure of Izzadin Kassam, the armed wing of Hamas.

Arafat admits as much, saying it is too risky, and has tried to reach understandings whereby Hamas, his main political opposition, will handle Izzadin Kassam.

He has been more direct with Islamic Jihad, which has no substantial political wing. Three weeks ago, his police shot down two members wanted by Israel for last year's Beit Lid bombing, and when Israel was presumed responsible for killing Jihad leader Fathi Shikaki in Malta, he did not shed a public tear.

However, with Hamas, the game is more subtle. Arafat claimed he reached a verbal understanding with Hamas which has prevented suicide attacks against Israel since August. Then came the assassination of Yehiya Ayyash, the Hamas bomb-maker. Hamas stopped cooperating and swore revenge. If Arafat's police thwarted Izzadin Kassam attacks, as Israel agrees it did, the police must have been tipped off by Hamas informants. So, when Israel was blamed for killing Ayyash, Arafat's praise of "The Engineer" as a prince of martyrs was simply a damage-control operation.

According to Gillon, Arafat began dealing more forcefully with Izzadin Kassam last April. That was when the Oslo 2 talks emerged from their slump, and then foreign minister Shimon Peres began issuing target dates for their completion.

Since April, there had been only two suicide attacks, one in Ramat Gan which Izzadin Kassam was reluctant to take credit for, and one in Jerusalem that was widely condemned by Palestinians. Meanwhile, Arafat built up his authority. The Oslo 2 agreement was completed. Elections loomed and Arafat expected easy victory, which would be sweeter if Hamas ran, too. The trauma of Ayyash's death passed. Hamas was seen to be an even smaller threat than expected, and Arafat enjoyed a convincing election victory.

Today, Arafat's position is much stronger than it was a year ago.

Hamas is torn between Izzadin Kassam and joining the peace talks. Hebron, a bastion of Hamas, is to be evacuated in one month, and Peres stands for re-election in May. Terror can in no way help Arafat, Hamas or the peace process.

If the attack was meant as a one-time atrocity to avenge Ayyash, with widespread acceptance by Palestinians, Arafat will probably let it pass as a blow aimed at Israel rather than himself. But if it means Hamas has reneged on its agreement to rein in Izzadin Kassam, he has no good political reason to tread softly with Hamas.

Jewish content mars play's excellence

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No one can argue that modern Israel and its relationship to Diaspora Jews is not good material for drama. On the other hand, Jason Sherman's Retreat at the Tarragon Theatre until March 17 uses the Israeli connection as window dressing for a play about a couple having an extra-marital affair and a wheeler-dealer film mogul using that affair to exact revenge on his partner.

The pre-show hype on Retreat was all about Rachel, a Hebrew school teacher who was in trouble for her views on doings in Israel.

So this reviewer poses a question: Does Sherman write in the Jewish characters, particularly the wheeler-dealer Jeff and his questionable Jewish jokes, because it is good box office?

Rather offensive

For my part, I found the references to Forest Hill Jews and the Jewish presence in movie making rather offensive, and only partly offset by the accurate depiction of Rachel's father as an Israeli pioneer bereft by current events.

It's not that Sherman can't write riveting dialogue, as he proves in Retreat and as he proved in an earlier play, The Trouble with Pamela, which has nary a Jewish character.

And it's not that Sherman doesn't understand the excruciating questions some Jews have about events in Israel, which form the subject of most of his plays.

What troubles this reviewer is the easy laughs Sherman draws at Jewish expense and the enthusiasm with which the audience greeted them. I don't think I'm being overly sensitive because I have given good reviews to plays which skewer Jewish lifestyles that are legitimate targets for satire.

With that off my chest, I can say that, with one exception, Retreat is a brilliantly written and acted examination of loyalty, deception and betrayal in the lives of four people.

Acting honors should go to Peter Hutt as the unlikable TV film producer, followed closely by Joseph Zigler as the more idealistic writer and Aron Tager as the ailing Israeli. Sarah Orenstein fails in the character of Rachel, being far too skittish to be credible as a dedicated Hebrew teacher manipulated by two warring film types.

Sarah Orenstein and Aron Tager star in Jason Sherman's The Retreat.

It is easier to fight for one's principles than to live up to them.

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There's no business like show business. Ask Toronto entrepreneur Ed Mirvish, owner of Honest Eds at Bloor and Bathurst, the Royal Alexandra and Princess of Wales Theatres on King Street and the Old Vic in England.

"It's a privilege and wonderful to be part of the theatre industry, but I wouldn't give up my day job," he said. "The theatre business is very risky. The bargains will be here when I wake up."

Mirvish, who restored the Royal Alex, built the Princess of Wales and bankrolled such high profile Toronto productions as Les Miserables, Miss Saigon, Tommy and Crazy For You, will be honored for his contribution to Canadian theatre on March 4 at a gala variety show at the Princess of Wales.

Performers will include some of this country's best-known actors, among them Gordon Pinsent, Cynthia Dale and Don Harron. The Canadian cast will be joined by American stars Donald O'Connor, who starred in the musical Say Hello to Harvey at the Royal Alex in 1982, and Hal Linden, who is best known for his role on the television series Barney Miller. Linden was featured in the 1965 production of Guys and Dolls at the Royal Alex.

Ed Mirvish will be honored at a gala variety show.

The people working on the show — an estimated 150 — are very enthusiastic, said Ernie Rubenstein, the show's producer. "They want it to be wonderful for Ed."

He said working on the show is a way to thank Mirvish and his son, David, for their support over the years.

Show director Kelly Robinson also said he is grateful for the opportunities Mirvish has given him and many other Canadians in theatre.

Grateful for his support

Mirvish is known for his zany sense of humor; over the years his promotions and legendary publicity stunts — such as 72-hour dance marathons and give-aways — for Honest Ed's generated a lot of media attention — and sales.

His formal foray into show business began with his 1962 purchase of the Royal Alex — at a bargain price of course. He paid $200,000, less than one-third of what it cost to build the theatre in 1907.

After refurbishing the Royal Alex, Mirvish converted the adjoining building into a restaurant for theatre-goers. Since then, the area has developed into a diversified entertainment district.

Proceeds from the event, which includes a party at Ed's Warehouse, will be going in part to the Mirvish fund for oncology at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. For more information call 416-872-1212.

Eye on Arts

Bronfman Documentary: An upcoming CBC documentary tells the rags-to-riches story of the Bronfmans, one of Canada's best-known and wealthiest families.

In Yiddish, Bronfman means Whisky Man, the name attributed to Sam Bronfman as a child by jeering classmates. Following his namesake and determined to overcome his poor Russian immigrant beginnings, Bronfman and his brothers started from scratch by making whisky in a warehouse in Yorkton, Sask.

The Bronfman empire flourished, selling liquor to American bootleggers during the 1920s prohibition years. By the time he died in 1971, Bronfman was a billionaire in control of the world's largest distillery. Today, Seagram is a global, diversified corporation, dealing in whisky, champagne, cognac – and now the entertainment industry, with the purchase of MCA/Universal Studios at a price of $5.7 billion (US).

Samuel Bronfman

Whisky Man: Inside the Dynasty of Samuel Bronfman captures Samuel Bronfman's private side in home movies and interviews with close family members. Directed by David Paperny, the documentary reveals the complex world of a legendary Montreal businessman who, while devoted to his family, was known to be consumed by work and subject to an explosive temper.

Tune in to CBC's Witness, March 5 at 9 p.m.

Yiddish Theatre & Song: Folksinger Naomi Bell and actress Gloria Valentine offer two four-session courses this spring in association with the Jewish Artists Scholarship Society (JASS).

Valentine's Yiddish Theatre Workshop helps participants develop stage confidence by reading, interpreting, acting and telling stories in Yiddish. Classes are April 1, 15, 22 & 29 at 7:30 p.m. 416-638-2222.

Bell's Yiddish Folksongs to Sing & Understand helps participants learn and understand dozens of songs; music and texts provided. Classes are May 1, 8, 15 & 22 at 8.15 p.m. 416-633-3416.

The fee for each course is $50 ($40 for JASS members) and classes take place at Earl Bales Park Community Centre, North York.

Holocaust-Related Events: Ronny Loewy of Frankfurt's Fritz Bauer Institut discusses the role of the German Holocaust Education Centre, dedicated to the memory of the attorney general who was so instrumental in the Auschwitz trials. March 3, 2 p.m. at the Studio Theatre, Harbourfront, Toronto.

At 4 p.m. in the same location, the feature film Abraham's Gold, by Jorg Graser, is being screened. The film tells the story of a small-town innkeeper who travels with a friend back to Auschwitz where the latter had buried a chest of gold teeth extracted from victims' skulls. (English subtitles.)

Both events are presented under the auspices of the Goethe-Institut with the cooperation of the Toronto Jewish Film Society and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee. Admission, $2 for each event. 416-924-3327.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Indian Odyssey: Two of our readers recently travelled for several days in India with the Team Canada trade mission headed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and several provincial premiers. They spent a day with the mission in New Delhi and three days in Bombay, where they met Pearl Padamsee, an Indian film star who is half-Hindi, half-Jewish. (Bombay's film industry is substantially larger than Hollywood's and turns out almost 1,000 films per year.)

Splitting from the trade mission, they toured northern India, seeing such sites as the Red Fort of the Moghuls in Delhi, the 18th-century observatory in Jaipur and the Taj Mahal in Agra, perhaps the most widely recognized symbol of India.

In the south, they toured Madras, Bangalore and the Malabar coast – including the town of Cochin, with its historic but dwindling Jewish community, one of the oldest in the Diaspora. Dating back to the days after the Second Temple (70 CE), the Jewish community prospered in medieval times from the spice trade, which turned Cochin into a thriving international port.

The road leading to Jewtown, as the Jewish neighborhood is called, is still lined with exotic spice, antique and curio shops, as well as signs in both Hebrew and English. Once tens of thousands of Jews lived here, but today there are only about 20 Jewish families left.

Built in 1568, the Cochin synagogue is the oldest in the British Commonwealth; it replaced another that was centuries older. The synagogue was nearly destroyed by Portuguese colonists who mercilessly persecuted Jews in the mid-1600s. The floor is tiled with ceramic tiles imported from Canton, China, two centuries ago. To commemorate the synagogue's 400th anniversary in 1968, Indira Gandhi visited and the Indian post office issued a stamp.

Besides many extraordinary travel memories, our friends brought home to Toronto a signed contract for business worth a reported $1.5 million.

Skiing in Utah: An estimated 131 inches of snow graced the slopes of Snowbird, a ski resort outside Salt Lake City, on the day Travel Talk rode a high-speed aerial tram up from roughly the 4,000-foot to the 8,000-foot level. More than 500 inches of snow fall annually on this, one of the best peaks for skiing in the Rocky Mountains Wasatch range.

As we made the spectacular ascent, tall pines receded below us and skiers snaked down the powdery slopes in S-shaped paths. With mounting vertigo, we watched as two snowboarders, momentarily poised on a cliff-edge, took the near-vertical plunge, adventurously surrendering to the white void.

It is clear why the International Olympic Committee has picked Salt Lake City as the site of the 2002 Winter Olympics. Delta Airlines (416-868-1717) offers regularly scheduled flights from Toronto to Salt Lake City. For information on skiing in Utah, contact the Salt Lake City Convention and Visitors Bureau, 180 S. Films explore impact of Holocaust on children

TORONTO – Dark Lullabies, a powerful feature documentary exploring the impact of the Holocaust on the post-war generation of Jews and Germans, will be showing at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue on March 3 at 7:30 p.m.

Dark Lullabies is a film about a generation possessed, a generation preoccupied by a history in which it played no part. Seen through the eyes of the filmmaker, Irene Lilienheim Angelico, a child of concentration camp survivors, the film explores the impact of the Holocaust on a generation of Jews and Germans born after World War II.

Angelico will be at the synagogue to introduce the film and field questions afterwards.

Tickets are $3 for members and $5 for non-members. Beth Tikvah Synagogue is located at 3080 Bayview Ave. in North York.

Also Holocaust related is Hidden Children showing on CBC Newsworld's The Passionate Eye airing March 3 at 8 p.m. EST.

Of the millions of Holocaust victims perhaps the least understood are the thousands of Jewish children who were hidden from the Nazis, sometimes by non-Jews, and forced to masquerade as gentiles.

By the end of the war many had developed close relationships with their new parents and had abandoned all ties to their own culture and faith.

Hidden Children follows the stories of six of these survivors who have struggled with their identities for most of their lives, living with the pain and guilt as survivors forced to abandon their heritage.

What is the heaviest thing in the world? An empty pocket.

Hockey player labors in obscurity waiting for a shot at the big league

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you don't aim high, you'll never attain your dreams.

That simple credo is helping sustain hockey player Mikhail Nemirovsky as he labors in the relative obscurity of the Colonial Hockey League en route, he hopes, to bigger and better things.

A leftwinger who counts skating, playmaking and stickhandling as his major skills, Nemirovsky believes he has the ability to score big in the National Hockey League.

At 21, he's still young enough and at six feet, 200 pounds, he's got the size to play with the big boys in the big league.

His younger brother, David, is a prospect with the Florida Panthers; so if bloodlines count for anything, that's another mark in his favor.

Earlier this season, Nemirovsky attended the training camp of the Pittsburgh Penguins' International Hockey League (I) affiliate, the Cleveland Lumberjacks. Even though he led the team in scoring during the exhibition season, he was let go.

He believes Cleveland had too many players in skill positions already under contract and didn't have the room to add another player of that type.

So he packed his hockey bag and headed to the Flint Generals of the Colonial League where he was placed on a scoring line with centre Scott Burfoot and rightwinger Kevin Kerr, a playing assistant coach.

In the first 21 games of the season, Nemirovsky bulged the twine 11 times and added 18 assists for 29 points. His finesse has earned him a spot on the team's powerplay and he gets lots of ice time when the teams are four a side.

"In Flint, they want us to skate and put pressure on their defence, to go to the net and stickhandle," Nemirovsky said in a telephone interview.

Even though he's been relatively successful on the ice, the tone of his voice suggests he's getting a little exasperated with the league itself. He spent last season with Hampton Road Admirals of the East Coast Hockey League, where the calibre of play is comparable to the Colonial League, and before that, two seasons with Spartak of the Soviet elite league.

The Colonial League is something else altogether — in a word, it's chippy if not completely dirty, he says.

This year, he's already had 10 stitches in the face, experienced bruised legs and and other minor injuries. Thunder Bay and Brantford are the biggest rule-benders and the refereeing is, need we say it, minor league.

"Some of the players, I don't know what they're trying to do. There's a lot of high sticking and hitting from behind," he said.

Nevertheless, Nemirovsky is determined to give each game his best shot, knowing NHL scouts are often in the stands. He's already predicting one of his teammates will be a sure draft prospect.

Two years ago when first interviewed by The CJN, he predicted that a teammate from Spartak was a sure bet for the NHL. Rookie Alexander Selivanov of Tampa Bay has proven him correct with 40 points in 53 games.

This time, he says, look out for Konstantin Kalomkov, a 17-year-old rightwinger with the speed and size (six foot four, 215 pounds) that NHL teams covet.

Nemirovsky plans to finish the season in Flint and then do a little scouting himself. "For the next camp, I've got to evaluate the teams to see if they need a playmaking scorer," he says.

That way he won't make the mistake he did last summer by going to a team already loaded in that category.

If he can't catch on with a team in the I or in the American Hockey League, Nemirovsky said he'll consider moving to Europe to play. He'll keep at it as long as the chance of playing in the NHL is a realistic prospect.

"I don't care if I'm 28 and make the NHL, as long as I'm moving forward," he said.

Nemirovsky, who was born in Odessa in the former Soviet Union, was brought to Canada as a baby. His brother David, 19, was born in Canada and the two grew up in Toronto playing a finesse — they call it a Russian — style of game.

Nemirovsky the Elder said he's intrigued at the prospect of playing for Canada at the 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel, which will see the inauguration of hockey at the "Jewish Olympics."

"That could be the only chance to play on the same team with my brother," he said.

Dear Lisa,

Last week I was fired from my job! I feel horrible. What should I do now? How will I ever be able to explain this in an interview.

Dear Reader,

Take heart. These days few people lose a job because of incompetence. Most people are being fired because of a shortage of work – downsizing. When companies let go of staff citing this reason, the companies are often able to provide their employees with relocation counselling assistance and other useful techniques to help you find work.

Some people lose their jobs because of personality differences with a supervisor or other employees. If this is your situation, take some time to think about what happened, be honest with yourself and learn what you can from the experience. But don't blame yourself. If other people within that company have lost their jobs because of personality differences, odds are your working for this company was not a great choice.

Being fired is often expected and some people find it a relief when it actually happens. Other emotions may include fear and anger. Fear may make you cry and ultimately destroy your self-confidence. Anger can make you say things you really don't mean. Be aware of your feelings and find appropriate times to express them. For the next little while you may find yourself on a roller coaster ride where fear and anger will take turns with excitement and optimism.

Before you do anything, acknowledge your feelings. Then take stock of your experience. Learn what you can. Make a resume. Speak to a relocation consultant or employment counsellor. Register for Unemployment Insurance, if you are eligibe. Consider updating your skills. Go to the library and start reading books on job hunting.

When you are asked how you lost your job be honest. You can explain personality differences but don't talk about how you and your boss hated each other. Talk about the good things you did for the company and how other people appreciated your efforts. Try to explain why you left your previous employer without overreacting or getting defensive.

If you lost your job because the company downsized, just say that. Today this explanation is common and should not reflect your ability to perform at work.

The most important aspect to keep in mind, however, is how you react to the situation. If you keep yourself calm and try to approach the experience from a somewhat positive perspective, it is likely that a future employer will follow your lead. Show future employers that you are a good worker, who had an unfortunate experience. Encourage future employers to believe in your strengths and abilities and they will likely disregard the fact you were ever fired from a job.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

War against Hamas

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres declared an all-out war against Hamas on Sunday, as Israelis mourned 18 victims of yet another suicide bus bombing in Jerusalem.

The powerful explosion stunned the country, occurring on the same bus line, on the same street and at the same time of day as the blast of almost two weeks ago. As some Israelis emerged from shivah for the 24 killed in last week's attack, others began mourning the new victims of yet another bloody Sunday.

The eerie rerun of scenes of carnage shattered an already fragile sense of security among Jerusalemites, many of whom refused to board buses all day, and plunged national morale to rock bottom.

"How much more suffering can we take?" cried a youth from Katamonim, a Jerusalem neighborhood that lost 16 residents in the two consecutive Bus #18 bombings.

Sunday's attack was a further blow to the government, making its week-old promises of action sound hollow and prompting Peres' harshest response yet to the wave of terror. Ashen-faced and angry, the prime minister announced new measures to beef up security and placate a frightened and furious public.

Peres said for the first time that the peace talks with the Palestinians would not continue until Arafat crushed the Islamic fundamentalist movement responsible for the bus bombings.

He added that neither the IDF pullout from Hebron nor the permanent settlement talks would proceed if the situation did not improve.

He called on Arafat to ban the military wing of the Hamas and Islamic Jihad, hunt down the organizations' leaders and disarm their members. Both Peres and IDF Chief of Staff Amnon Shahak said that if Arafat proved unable to deal with Hamas, "someone else would."

The prime minister said that the Oslo accord would not prevent Israel from entering the Palestinian autonomy areas in order to pursue its war against terrorists.

The main new measures announced by Peres include the implementation of a 260-million shekel Separation Plan that will close off the West Bank and Gaza Strip from Israel; the establishment of a special 800-person force to provide bus security; the deployment of an additional 2,200 police and soldiers in Jerusalem; and the destruction of the homes of the families of terrorists.

President Ezer Weizman urged the government to also suspend negotiations with Syria and demand that Arafat annul the Palestinian Covenant immediately.

Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu said he would support the measures taken by Peres, but maintained that the prime minister had not gone far enough.

'We will destroy them': Peres

The following are exerpts from the press conference Sunday evening with Prime Minister Peres.

"Arafat must act according to the agreement. If he doesn't we will have to draw our conclusions,"

"There will be no holds barred in Israel's total war against Hamas and other terrorist groups," said Peres at a press conference. "This is war ... and we will fight ... until we destroy these organizations to the core. Hamas has declared war on Israel, and Israel will act accordingly."

"We all agree to uproot this organization to the foundations. We will not shy from any measure. We will spare no effort. We decided to give this war the highest and most unequivocal priority – all that we have in men, ideas and means."

Hamas strikes in Tel Aviv

As The CJN was going to press, we received the following news from Leora Frucht, our correspondent in Israel.

TEL AVIV — Less than 24 hours after Prime Minister Shimon Peres declared total war on Hamas, the terror group struck another fatal blow against Israel, this time in the heart of Tel Aviv, killing at least 12 and wounding more than 80 people in a suicide bombing.

The attacker apparently strapped explosives to his body and blew himself up on a crowded street corner outside the Dizengoff Centre shopping mall. The blast occurred just before four in the afternoon on the eve of Purim as children, dressed in holiday costumes, congregated at this central spot. Several were among the casualties of this suicide bombing – the third in eight days.

In a television interview conducted minutes after hearing about the attack, Prime Minister Peres vowed to wage and win the war against Hamas. "We will strike back," he said. "In war there are blows; there is pain. It's a test for the entire people and for the government of Israel. If we don't give up, I know we will win."

Peres was to convene an emergency cabinet session on Monday evening to decide what further action could be taken.

CJC CONDEMNS THE KILLING OF INNOCENT JEWS BY ARAB TERRORISTS

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has condemned the second terrorist bombing of a Jerusalem bus in as many weeks, which killed at least 19 innocent civilians and injured dozens of others.

"While tragically it is innocent Jews who are being murdered the Arab terrorists are working against the interests of their own Palestinian people," said CJC president Goldie Hershon. "While we support the peace process it is clear the Israeli government, like any other government in the world, has as its first responsibility the protection of the lives of its citizens, its way of life and its territorial integrity.

"Even the long suffering people of Israel have limits to their patience," she added. "Once again terrorism's ugly face hovers over the region. Regrettably, the history of Israel and indeed of the Jewish people has been one of response to repeated atrocities in every generation."

CJC extends its profound sympathy to the families of the Israeli victims and wishes a speedy recovery to those injured.

CIC CALLS FOR MEETING WITH AXWORTHY

OTTAWA – In the aftermath of last Sunday's bus-bombing in Jerusalem, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) has called for an immediate meeting with Canada's Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy.

"The world cannot stand by offering heartfelt, but ultimately ineffective words of consolation, as dozens of innocent Israelis are murdered and scores of others mutilated on a weekly basis," said CIC national chair Stephen Victor.

"Neither direct security measures by Israel nor arrests of Hamas supporters by the Palestinian Authority are sufficient to ensure the safety of the Israeli public. The lifeline of these terrorist groups must be cut off and for that, the international community must work in perfect cooperation and with common resolve," Victor said.

"Canada and other Western countries must clearly indicate to the Palestinian Authority that their continued support is dependent on the Palestinians' moving fully and unambiguously to outlaw and disarm the terrorist wings of Hamas and other Muslim terror organizations operating in areas under Palestinian control.

"Moreover," Victor said, "peace will never be a reality until the Palestinian Covenant is satisfactorily amended to extract all references to the destruction of Israel.»

On behalf of the CIC, Victor conveyed his condolences to the bereaved families and expressed solidarity with Israel during this painful period.

CANADIAN FRIENDS OF PEACE NOW QUESTIONS ARAFAT'S EFFORTS

TORONTO – Canadian Friends of Peace Now is shocked and angered by yet another suicide bombing in Israel committed by Hamas, the national president of the organization said.

Simon Rosenblum asked how many more Israelis must die in Hamas' last-ditch efforts to destroy the peace process?

"Stopping terrorism is by no means an easy task, as Israel is fully aware. Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority (PA) has been making some sincere efforts to that end. But not enough," he said.

COMMEMORATIVE ASSEMBLY MARCH 7

TORONTO – The local Jewish community is organizing a commemorative assembly to express its anger and frustration over the recent bus bombings in Israel on Thursday, March 7, at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 470 Glencairn, at 7:30 p.m.

The decision was made following an emergency meeting of community leaders called by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The assembly will allow the community to share the pain and suffering experienced by the families of the victims of terrorism and all the people of Israel, according to CJC.

The commemorative assembly is being sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada; CJC, Ontario region; the Canadian Zionist Federation; and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Bus Bombings — Reaction

Canadian Arab Network:
The Canadian Arab Network strongly condemns the brutal, vicious and cowardly bombing in Israel, and the senseless killing of innocent civilians. We extend our deepest and sincere condolences to the Israeli people, Israeli government and especially to the victims' families, in their moments of sorrow and grief.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Canadian Jews return from largest UIA mission

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Over 1,100 Canadian Jews returned home last week, after getting a taste of Israel that they will never forget.

The members of the United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada's largest mission to Israel stayed at a kibbutz that was the target of an aborted hang-gliding attack, they were in Eilat when that resort town was shaken by a mild earthquake and they were having breakfast in Jerusalem when a bomb went off in a bus in the capital, killing 24 and injuring dozens.

"There was terrible shock and fear after the suicide bus bombing," said Sandra Brown, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. "But we soon realized that this is part of life in Israel. People learn to pick themselves up and get on with life. We took an example from Israelis and did just that."

The attempted attack by a hang-gliding terrorist from Lebanon took place on the night the Canadian mission arrived at Kibbutz Manara near the northern border. The hang-glider — who had, according to reports, targeted that kibbutz — was blown up over Lebanon. Mission members read about the incident in newspapers the following day.

The trip to Eilat included only Toronto participants who were visiting the Project Renewal and Partnership 2000 neighborhoods with which they are twinned. The earthquake, a mild aftershock of a large tremor in November, was felt by very few. It was the bus bombing in Jerusalem that was most disturbing for the Canadian Jews, 60 percent of whom were on their first visit to Israel.

"It was shocking," said Sheila Sinukoff of Toronto. "Our tour guide was on his way to meet us. He passed by the site of the attack only five minutes after it happened. He told us that it's just something that Israelis learn to live with."

"It was unsettling, but it wouldn't stop me from coming back to Israel," said Dr. Warren Sinukoff, a first-time visitor. "There are bombs in London and many other places."

The Sinukoffs joined the mission to celebrate their 50th birthdays. "It was a more meaningful way to mark our birthdays than throwing a party," said Sinukoff, a general practitioner, who said it was also the first time he had ever left his practice for a two-week period. "I don't regret a single second of the trip. There were moments of grief and frustration. But overall it was an emotionally uplifting, educationally rewarding experience — a real awakening."

The UIA mission members — who filled two jumbo jets and travelled in 25 buses — toured Israel following individual tracks, designed to suit the particular interests of participants. All groups took part in an opening ceremony in the new Olympic Ice Skating Arena at Canada Centre in the northern town of Metulla. Both facilities were built with the support of Canadian Jewry.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert addressed the mission during a gala ceremony in Jerusalem. A particularly moving moment in the evening was the relaying of a message from Yitzhak Rabin to Canadian Jewry. Harvey Wolfe, president of UIA of Canada, read aloud the letter from Rabin which was received on Oct. 30, 1995, only five days before his death.

"As prime minister of Israel, I look forward to the arrival of the Canadian mega-mission...The mega-mission is a demonstration of solidarity between your communities and Israel. This is of special importance at this historical time when Israel is waging its struggle for peace.

"We want to continue our partnership with you. As we enter the 21st century, that partnership will be altered but it will never end because wherever we live all Jews are one people.

"By coming to Israel on this mission, you will see the reality with your own eyes. You will see the miracle that is Israel. You will see what we have accomplished with the help of fellow Jews all over the world. You will see what still remains to be done. I hope that after you have visited you will feel that Israel is your home."

Rabin had signed the letter: "Le'hitraot be'Israel — See you in Israel."

The mission was made up of 620 participants from Montreal, 360 from Toronto, 53 from Winnipeg, 26 from Edmonton, 24 from Calgary, 10 from Vancouver and a few dozen from smaller communities across Canada. "This is the largest operation we have ever undertaken," said Wolfe.

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair.

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. "The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5 regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Funding complaint goes to the UN

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Metro Toronto man has filed a complaint with the United Nations, alleging Canada is violating international law because Ontario does not fund Jewish day schools.

Said to be the first of its kind, the complaint alleges that Canada discriminates on the basis of religion because Ontario's Roman Catholic schools are the only non-secular schools receiving full public funding from the province.

Arieh Waldman, whose two sons are enrolled at Bialik Hebrew Day School, wants Queen's Park to fund all religiously-based schools equally.

The complaint filed last week with the Geneva-based UN Human Rights Committee says Canada, a signatory to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, is violating provisions on discrimination on the basis of religion because of Ontario's stand.

At a press conference last week, Waldman and his lawyer, Raj Anand, a former chief commissioner of Ontario's Human Rights Commission, noted that Ontario is the only province in Canada to fund some religious-based schools but not others.

Waldman's 52-page brief to the UN notes that he pays over $14,000 a year in tuition for his sons and must also pay education taxes — a burden not shared by Catholics.

The complaint represents a new approach to an issue that began in 1984, when retiring premier Bill Davis announced the extension of full public funding for education in grades 11, 12 and 13 in the Catholic Separate school Board.

Since then, Jewish groups have lobbied hard for funding of at least the secular portion of Jewish education, arguing it is unfair to fund Catholics and no one else.

In 1987, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Ontario's funding of Catholic schools was permitted under the compromise that formed Confederation in 1867.

But the matter is still before the courts. In late January, the Supreme Court heard final arguments from five Jewish parents who allege that funding Catholic schools violates the Charter of Rights and Freedoms' equality provisions, and that the charter's guarantee of freedom of religion requires the government to fund Jewish schools as well. The court has reserved its decision.

Waldman argues that Ontario's religious makeup has changed radically since 1867, with non-Christians now comprising eight percent of the population, versus .2 percent at Confederation.

Waldman took his action "because I've waited long enough for the Canadian and Ontario governments to take action and live up to their human rights promises.

"It is time that Ontario's disgraceful violation of equality rights is clearly understood as a breach of this country's international commitments to equal treatment," he said in a statement.

Waldman and Anand conceded that the UN committee cannot order Canada and Ontario to change their laws, but that it can find Canada in violation of international rules on religious freedom.

They said Canada has been found by the UN committee to have breached its human rights obligations seven times since it began considering human rights cases in 1977.

In one of those, Canada changed its Indian Act following a successful grievance by a native Canadian.

Anand said a decision could take as long as three years.

Zimriyah choir festival began on a sad note

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — One of the Toronto Jewish community's most uplifting musical events began on a very sad note this year.

Zimriyah, the Jewish school choir festival, took place last Sunday, just hours after two terrorist bombings in Israel killed 27 people.

The sad irony was that the theme of this year's Zimriyah was Jerusalem, the very place one of the bombs had exploded.

"It was very difficult to go into a Zimriyah on Jerusalem because of what happened," said Joyce Levine, the Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) coordinator of school services and of the Zimriyah, but she added, "I think it was important that Zimriyah was dedicated to Jerusalem at a time like this."

Joseph M. Steiner, chair of the BJE, acknowledged the mood of sadness in the sanctuary of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, where the festival was held. "It is good for us to be together on these occasions," he told the audience.

Elliot Sokolsky, a grade 3 student from United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) Bayview campus, sings a solo with the USDS choir.

"Our children have worked hard to prepare for this. It's appropriate that we use this occasion to reaffirm our solidarity with Israel and with Jerusalem," he said.

Zimriyah, now in its 31st year, is sponsored by the BJE. It keeps growing in popularity; a record number of students and schools participated this year, Levine said.

Some 630 students, up from 540 last year, performed in 15 choirs from 14 different schools. (Associated Hebrew Schools had two choirs.) The Hamilton Hebrew Academy participated for the first time and guest artist Reuven Zemer performed The Other Jerusalem.

To accommodate the large number of participants and their families, Zimriyah was divided into two separate shows, with roughly half the choirs performing in each. The sanctuary, set up for 1,350 people, was filled to capacity for both shows.

The choirs came from eight day schools — Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School, United Synagogue Day Schools, Associated Hebrew Schools, Netivot HaTorah Day School, She'arim Herbrew Day School, Kadima School and Hamilton Hebrew Academy — and six supplementary schools — the Downtown Jewish Community School, United Congregational Schools, and Temple Sinai, Beth Tzedec, Shaar Shalom, Temple Kol Ami religious schools.

The individual choirs performed their own repertoires — all the songs were about Jerusalem — and sang several songs together.

Doron Ophir, the musical director of the event, made a tape of the medleys, which the individual choirs learned on their own. They had only one opportunity to rehearse together as a large group the week before, he said.

Levine praised Ophir for his contribution. He prepares all the songs and music, which he distributes to the schools in the fall; he then stays in constant touch with the schools until Zimriyah, she explained.

The children were accompanied by live musicians conducted by Ophir, giving the whole festival a "real professionalism," she added.

She also credited Zimriyah stage manager Rivka Atzmony with the show's artistry.

"Rivka gives it a spark. She and Doron work well together," Levine said, but ultimately, "it's the choir leaders and the students who are the stars."

Soloveitchik to lecture

TORONTO — One of the continent's premier scholars will share with a local audience his perceptions of a major shift in the religious development of the Jewish community.

Rabbi Haim Soloveitchik will lecture on Rupture and Reconstruction: The Transformation of Contemporary Jewry, on March 10 at 8 p.m., at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 470 Glencairn Ave., under the auspices of the Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University. Admission is free.

The lecture will be based on an essay published by Rabbi Soloveitchik in the summer 1994 edition of Tradition magazine.

He has requested that those attending his presentation should read the Tradition article. Reprints are available without charge at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Former Heritage Front member delivers powerful message

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Students from several Ontario school boards expressed their shock after attending a recent screening of Hearts of Hate, a documentary filmed several years ago, about Canada's growing racist movement.

The film, followed by a discussion with Peter Raymont, its producer, and Elizabeth Moore, a former Heritage Front member, was presented by the North York Board of Education and the generation to generation sub-committee of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. Program moderator was Bernie Farber, national director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress.

Students, who came by the busload from as far away as Waterloo, were visibly shaken, and one demanded to know from Elizabeth Moore, who appeared in the film as a Heritage Front member, how she can be trusted not to rejoin the racist organization.

"When you leave the Heritage Front, you do not mess around. I am branded for the rest of my life. To take the route I have taken, I cannot afford to be superficial. I hope you people will learn from me," Moore answered.

Moore, 22, who has become an outspoken anti-racist since leaving the Heritage Front about a year ago, told the students and teachers that as a high school student she was exposed to a lot of racial tension and became the victim of racial insults.

"I started to get angry and when I met a member of the Heritage Front, he started telling me his view of the world. He explained that the Front was not a hate group, but rather a white man's answer to multiculturalism. I only had his view to go on.

"I started to get involved and they knew exactly what to say to me. They made me feel that every racist act was an empowerment. I took to this new outlook and it made me feel good to be doing something. By the time I realized I wanted to get out, I was running a racist hotline, putting up fliers and making speeches. I was completely wrapped up in the organization.

"I became more and more conscious, however, of the Front's violent activities. There was a very violent side to the movement and I was aware that if I said the wrong thing I might be next."

After hearing Bernie Farber speak in Kingston, where Moore was a Queen's University student, she approached him and he encouraged her to leave her boyfriend, also a member of the organization.

"I went to visit the Hololcaust Memorial Centre with Bernie and suddenly all my views seemed completely ridiculous and absurd. I saw the video there and felt subhuman. I realized I was at the bottom of the heap, and that is not easy to accept. I had everything in the world and I had handed my humanity over to these people without a struggle. Bernie, told me, however, that the important thing about humanity is that you can get it back. Thank G-d he's right."

Racist activities today are different than 30 years ago, said Farber.

"The Heritage Front has gotten its message out to young people and when viewing Heritage Front videos since 1983, you can see the average age drops from 70 to 17. Many people do not realize how dangerous these people are. They are not in the mainstream, but they hover around the mainstream. There is a group of new young Nazis who are waiting to take over and restart the Heritage Front.

Asked what can be done to fight racism, Farber replied that he would like to see the classroom as a place to engage in discussion.

"If everyone decided to do something, something would get done. Write to the Ministry of Justice and the attorney general and say that it is time to lay charges against hatemongers in Ontario."

One student said, "Hate built up in me when I watched the movie, so I can see how easily hate can be nurtured. I commend Elizabeth for trying to repair the damage she's done."

Another said that as long as there are people, there is going to be hate, and "I think it will be too late by the time people realize that."

Community key to fighting hatred

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At a police chiefs' conference a couple of years ago, a participant from one of Ontario's smaller communities downplayed the issue of hate crimes, labelling it "Metro's problem." Ironically, a cross was burned in his community within three weeks, said David Boothby, chief of police for Metropolitan Toronto.

Boothby, who was instrumental in establishing Metro's hate crimes unit three years ago, was keynote speaker at a recent League for Human Rights event on Combatting Hate-Motivated Crime in Metro. The evening focused on police/community partnerships — particularly the youth aspect — in fighting hate.

"As we increase the awareness, I would suggest we will have hate crime units in other centres right across Canada," said Boothby. Currently only a few such units have been established — Boothby mentioned Halifax, Edmonton, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Montreal — but other police forces are taking the initial steps.

To reduce hate crimes in the future, Boothby said "we all have to be very careful what we say and do in our homes, in our communities and in our workplaces, because children imitate us."

The event held at the B'nai Brith building on Hove Street also included a student play entitled No One Has The Right, produced by students of Scarborough's Albert Campbell Collegiate Institute following a suggestion by the hate crimes unit.

"It's important for the group not being victimized to show support. Otherwise the victim feels terribly alone, afraid and vulnerable," said Karen Mock, director of the League, in a video co-produced by the League, the Scarborough Board of Education and the Metropolitan Toronto Police hate crimes unit.

Mock also stressed, as did Boothby, the importance of reporting hate-related incidents.

The League has been documenting anti-Semitic incidents for the past 14 years, said Rochelle Wilner, vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada and national education chair of the League, which is under the B'nai Brith umbrella.

The Human Rights Youth League was formed in 1993, to give young people from a variety of backgrounds a constructive, non-violent forum from which to deal with racism and related issues.

Jesse Kaufman, 17, president of the youth league, urged others to join him in pressuring Ontario's attorney general Charles Harnick to prosecute hate criminals.

Det. Dino Doria presented "respect certificates" to members of the youth league and representatives of the League for Human Rights on behalf of the hate crimes unit.

Ex-Airborne member charged

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A white supremacist and former corporal in the Canadian Armed Forces' notorious Airborne Regiment was arrested in Calgary last week and charged with second-degree murder.

Matt McKay, 25, was arrested in connection with the 1991 murder in Winnipeg of Gordon Kuhtey. Also arrested and charged in connection with the murder are 24-year-old Robert Eugene Welsh of Winnipeg, a suspected former leader of the Northern Hammerskins, a white supremacist group, and James Russel Lisik, 22, of Penticton, B.C.

Gary Allan Kuffner, 27, was arrested the next day.

Winnipeg police said they believe the 48-year-old Kuhtey was beaten to death because his attackers thought he was gay. Kuhtey was beaten in an area of Winnipeg where homosexuals regularly gathered.

McKay was part Canada's troubled peacekeeping mission sent to Somalia in 1993. Canadians were subsequently shocked to discover that McKay and others formed a small circle of white supremacists and skinheads who made racist remarks on videotapes later broadcast on Canadian media.

The Airborne was disbanded in 1994 following reports of racist attitudes in its ranks, wild hazing rituals and the deaths of four Somalis at the hands of Canadian soldiers. An inquiry is proceeding on Canada's peacekeeping mission in Somalia.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) first raised the question of McKay's neo-Nazi links early in 1993, after newspapers carried a 1990 photograph of him wearing a Hitler T-shirt and giving the straight-arm Nazi salute in his barracks.

McKay was known to CJC "for many years as a leading member of violent hate groups in Edmonton and Calgary," said Hal Joffe, CJC's national community relations committee chair.

Joffe said Kuhtey's murder underscores the need to ensure that gays and lesbians have the same rights and protections as others.

The whole episode raises more questions about how the military screens its personnel, said CJC's Bernie Farber.

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights expressed relief at the arrests, saying it too warned of the dangers McKay posed.

Canada deports German neo-Nazi

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A friend of Ernst Zundel, convicted of 12 to 14 neo-Nazi hate crimes, was ordered deported to Germany by Canadian immigration last week.

Oliver Bode, 29, who helped Zundel rebuild his Carlton Street home on a previous visit to Toronto, was scheduled to be deported March 2, despite an appeal by Zundel, who acted as his counsel at the deportation hearing.

"We commend the government strongly for acting so quickly," said Steven Shulman, Canadian Jewish Congress associate director of community relations. "There was no doubt Zundel knew he was coming, because Bode had a suitcase with videotapes of three neo-Nazi rallies in Germany. This was no ordinary tourist on his way to Niagara Falls."

Bode was red-flagged on immigration computers because of his convictions in Germany and was stopped at Pearson International Airport Feb. 24.

Zundel argued unsuccessfully at the one-hour hearing that some of the criminal convictions against his client in Germany are not valid in Canada.

"I've ordered that you be deported from Canada and that you cannot return without a letter of personal consent from the immigration minister," adjudicator Edward McNamara ruled.

Because Bode was stopped does not mean that other Zundel supporters from Germany will not try to get into Canada to support Zundel, a notorious Holocaust denier, Shulman said.

"That can happen with any criminal violation, but we're gratified that in this case the system worked to keep Bode out."

Bode remained locked up at the Celebrity Inn on Airport Road until escorted to the airport for his KLM flight out of the country.

"If anyone has any doubt whether this fellow is a hatemonger or not, it's all erased when you see who his representative is," said Shulman.

At the hearing, Zundel agreed with McNamara that an assault causing bodily harm conviction registered against Bode in the 1980s was comparable to similar provisions under Canada's Criminal Code.

Deportation Adjourned

TORONTO — The deporation hearing for alledged war criminal Konrad Kalejs was adjourned to May last week.

Kalejs was expelled from the United States in 1988 after a finding that he was a senior officer in a Nazi execution during World War II.

The adjournment was ordered after it was agreed that it would take more time to prepare for a hearing.

Hate Crimes Unit

VICTORIA — British Columbia's attorney general is taking steps towards forming a special hate crimes unit within his ministry.

The initiative comes on the heels of a Justice Department report released in Ottawa last week.

Attorney General Ujjal Dosanjh has his staff identifying experts in the legal, academic and law enforcement fields.

At this point though, he said no special funding is being directed towards the idea.

Jerusalem 3000

MONTREAL — A tripartite committee is producing an educational package for Jerusalem 3000 celebrations geared towards small Jewish communities in Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress, the department of education of the Joint Authority (World Zionist Organization) and the Jewish National Fund have joined forces to prepare suitable material to assist smaller communities with the Jerusalem 3000 theme in mind.

MLA To Step Down

VANCOUVER — NDP MLA Bernie Simpson, the province's sole Jewish representative, announced that he would not run in the next provincial election, expected sometime this year.

Simpson said he would continue to work for the NDP during the next election.

Librarians' Convention

TORONTO — Members of the Association of Jewish Librarians (AJL) will gather here June 16, for the first conference held in Canada in 10 years.

The conference, led by Edmond Lipsitz, will focus on the theme Culture and Continuity.

Blood-soaked Sunday

As these words were being written, 18 more people were being buried in Israel, their lives suddenly ended, their families and friends forever diminished, in a flash of fire and hate in the early morning of another blood-soaked Sunday in the holy city of Jerusalem.

What words of comfort can abate so unabatable a loss? There are none. There are only words of mourning and large gaping silences of incomprehension. Decent people recoil.

But after the silence there must be words of resolve. All governments that stand on and for the foundations of democracy, all people who cherish peace and seek it for others, must resolve to abhor and to root out from all international forums and norms, the loathsome evil that is known by the name Hamas.

Shimon Peres has declared war on Hamas. But it is not a war Israel should wage alone. For it is not only Jewish life and a peace process which are imperilled. The very essence of our democratic values – the belief in the uniqueness and in the sanctity of all individual life – is at stake. Hamas cares nothing for individual life. It cares only for the fundamentalist, intolerant ideology that it would impose on others.

Western democracies, including Canada, which in the past were so often quick to hector Israel, should finally agree to isolate, by concerted, appropriate means, those countries and organizations which fund or otherwise aid terrorist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The aiders and abettors of terrorist groups must be treated as the pariahs that they truly are.

The Palestinian Authority must finally show its true colors. Peace with Israel cannot coexist alongside compromise with Hamas. The people of Israel must not be left to wonder constantly at Yasser Arafat's real game. Either he destroys Hamas or they destroy the Palestinians' chance for a life of self-rule and peace. His pronouncements after Sunday's bombing inched closer to the truth than at any time in the past. He acknowledged publicly for the first time that the murder of Israelis by Hamas is also the murder of possibility and hope for the Palestinians. But pronouncements without action will be seen as the pro forma rhetoric which they are. He must now act.

The people of Israel – in Israel and in the Diaspora – must unite. These words are written with great humility. For though we in the Diaspora can relate, can understand, can even see the street in our mind's memory, the suffering we "experience" from our vantage is once removed, primarily indirect – horrible, sickening images on a television screen or audible anxiety at the end of a phone line.

The suffering of our kinfolk in Israel, however, is of another, more immediate, more terrible kind. They not only see the street in their mind's memory, they board the buses and they walk on the blood-splattered pavement. They collect and bury the dead or what is left of them. They sob at the graveside.

But though the anguish is great and even unbearable, we must avoid the self-accusation and the self-recrimination which merely feed the vicious maw of the Hamas murderers. The scenes of the angry Jewish mob hurling insult and invective upon the prime minister as he surveyed the site of the carnage were a horrible reminder of a terrible, black day barely four months ago, of a society setting upon itself in a frenzy of bewilderment and anger.

Shimon Peres is not the enemy. Anyone who claims the contrary is rewarding the people who hate Jews and who stop at nothing to ensure that, along with Jews, peace will also die.

Finestone will pursue interests of Mount Royal

While it has been a unique and satisfying experience to serve in the ministry of our government, there has never been a more important role and responsibility, that I have always tried to respect and fulfil to the best of my ability, than that of being member of Parliament for Mount Royal Riding. The privilege of reflecting the concerns of my constituents, with whom I keep in touch by phone, mail and personal contact is the key to my philosophy of the role of a member of Parliament.

Canada and the people of Mount Royal are dear to me. I am as deeply attached to Montreal, Quebec, Canada and my ancestral home land as I am to my family. I share my pride of belonging to all these realities in my life, which are not in conflict but are all important factors that have given me the unique opportunity to grow within their arms to a happy, meaningful and purposeful life. I have never been more energized to preserve these identities as the paragon of all that is good in national and personal life.

I intend to continue to ensure that the voice of our very special pluralistic riding will be heard as that of important stakeholders in Canadian society. I believe we reflect the will of the people to live together in mutual respect for our differences, with pride and attachment to our country and its democratic values.

I shall pursue efforts to ensure harmony, trust and well-being in the interests of all constituents in Mount Royal. My commitment to them will forever remain unwavering.

Shalom Achshav youth program

Steve Mock (CJN Feb. 15) described the first "official" meeting between Israeli and Palestinian student organizations supported by the Labor party, held on Jan. 24.

Unofficially, however, for the past few years, Shalom Achshav (Peace Now) in Israel has been initiating such joint activities at a rapid pace on an ongoing basis.

Today, Shalom Achshav has established programs for more than 2,000 Israeli and Palestinian students at junior, high school and university levels across Israel, the West Bank and Gaza. So successful are these programs that there are currently another 2,000 students asking to participate in a wide variety of activities which include exchange visits, seminars, bikathons for peace and ongoing dialogue groups.

Arafat fails to act on PLO covenant

In "A chat with Shimon Peres" (CJN, Feb. 22), Peres was reminded that he had said the "peace train will stop" if Yasser Arafat does not rescind the PLO Covenant's anti-Israel clause.

Why has Arafat not honored his commitment?

Using Peres' words, Arafat made the commitment before the entire world; fulfilment of this commitment ought logically to be a sine qua non for the peace process. And besides, one should bear in mind that this commitment even honored, remains vulnerable.

Objects to measures against poor

Harris nonsense or not, Canadians realize that eliminating the deficit is a top priority. However, while debt reduction is saddled on the backs of the disenfranchised, who are blamed for our woes, those at the top of our financial and political structures maintain increasing wealth and power.

We have bought the line of the power elite controlled mass media, that the poor are the problem, not the corporate greed that is eroding our society. In the name of the deficit, we punish those on welfare, oppress the unemployed and turn our backs on 500,000 Ontario children who are at risk.

I for one do not want a tax cut that comes at the expense of children.

Perspectives

In defence of "common sense"

By LORRIE GOLDSTEIN

It is always difficult to debate someone like Rabbi Dow Marmur who claims, not to be objective, merely to be right.

The fact remains that in arguing that the Tories' Common Sense Revolution in Ontario is worse than the disease it seeks to remedy (CJN Perspectives, Feb. 8), Rabbi Marmur has deliberately chosen to all but ignore the disease.

In order to test his thesis, then, let us begin at the beginning, by describing the malady to which he refers only in passing.

Ontario today is among the highest taxed jurisdictions in North America. Over the past 10 years, its two previous governments hiked taxes 65 times, including 11 hikes to personal income taxes. In the same period, public spending more than doubled to $53 billion, outstripping both inflation and population growth. While spending soared, so did public debt — tripling to $100 billion in 10 years.

By the time the NDP was voted out of office last year, Ontario's public debt was steadily rising at the rate of $10 billion annually.

Between 1982 and 1995, spending on welfare in Ontario, which pays out among the highest benefits in North America, rose from $930 million per year to more than $6 billion. At the same time, the number of people on welfare increased fourfold. Until very recently, the number on welfare, now well over one million, had continued to rise through periods of both economic slowdown and growth.

Today, the Ontario government still spends $1 million more every hour than it takes in. Taxpayers spend almost $8 billion per year paying simply the interest on debt, more than we pay for social assistance.

It is this disease, culminating in the eventual inability of previous governments to generate tax revenues even as they increased taxes, that has resulted in numerous symptoms, a few of which Rabbi Marmur eloquently laments. In fact, the quality of everything government does, not just its ability to look after "the poor ... the old, the weak and even the lazy" — to use Rabbi Marmur's terms — has been in decline for some time.

Despite this reality, Rabbi Marmur argues the problem with the "common sense" of the current government and of the average person — that we could not go on the way we had been and that the status quo was not an option — has led to the essentially godless philosophy of "what is mine is mine and what is yours is yours."

This is nonsense. Reducing welfare rates, as this government has done, from 30 percent above the average of the other nine provinces to 10 percent — still leaving us as one of the highest welfare-paying jurisdictions in North America — can hardly be fairly or accurately described as creating a world in which "there can never be sharing."

The reality is that for now, there cannot be as much sharing as there once was, because of the spendthrift attitudes of the two previous governments. As is the case with so many ideological critics of this current government, Rabbi Marmur avoids any mention of this reality, other than to observe that he, and we, should take no comfort from the fact "previous governments may not have done better." (Not done better at what — spending more, spending less, spending wisely?)

Rembrandt's image of Jeremiah contemplating the many difficulties of leading his people, poignantly expresses the conscience-testing quandaries faced by leaders when they must find fair, reasonable and humane solutions to complicated problems.

Then again, as we have already observed. Rabbi Marmur, donning the mantle of the Hebrew prophets on behalf of the poor and disadvantaged, does not claim to be objective, only to be right.

But if it is right to condemn the architects of the Common Sense Revolution for, say, advocating the layoff of 13,000 to 20,000 civil servants in order to control costs, then surely it is wrong not to have condemned in similarly strong language and with equal prominence and vigor, Ottawa's decision last year to fire 45,000 civil servants.

If it is wrong to cut welfare payments in Ontario by $1 billion as the Common Sense Revolution has done, then what of the decision to slash $2 billion from unemployment insurance, as the federal government recently announced? Indeed, why has the Liberal government in Ottawa escaped the brunt of the theological storm (not just from Rabbi Marmur but from the United Church and other religious leaders), to say nothing of provincial governments across Canada of every ideological stripe from Liberal to NDP to Parti Québécois?

They too, have all either embarked down the path of restraint, many long before Ontario did, or expressed the immediate need and desire to do so. Interestingly, it has only been the Tory governments of Ontario and Alberta that have been continuously denounced by some critics.

It is true that not all of these other restraint programs have been as drastic as those outlined in the Common Sense Revolution, but the fact is that when the current government took over in Ontario, it faced a greater problem than most other jurisdictions, due in large part to the prolific spending of the two previous administrations.

This left us with the highest per capita deficit of any province in Canada and the third highest per capita debt. By failing to address these aspects of the disease that has led to the remedy of which Rabbi Marmur disapproves, we are left to wonder about his position on any number of issues.

Does he believe the debt and deficit need to be reduced, or not? Does he believe most Ontarians, and for that matter Canadians, are lying when they tell pollsters they have hit the tax wall and cannot afford to pay any more in taxes? Is he suggesting there is some way to cut public spending in which no entitlements, programs or workers will be affected? Does he, not wishing to be objective but only to be right, support the idea of restraint in theory but object to every cut in practice as yet another example of "cruelty and callousness"?

None of this is to suggest that the current government in Ontario, or governments in general, are above criticism for the way they are pursuing restraint.

There is a school of thought that argues Canada's debt problem is the result, not of spending on social programs, but of the high interest rate policies of the central bank, policies which have had the added negative effect of keeping unemployment high.

Then again, such concerns, if valid, are more appropriately addressed to the federal jurisdiction, since that is where monetary policy is set.

On the provincial front, one can even be a Conservative and have concerns about the recently-passed Tory omnibus law which, contrary to the "less government" promises of the current administration during its election campaign, in fact centralizes even more power in the cabinet.

It has also become clear that the current government at Queen's Park is corporate rather than populist in its "common sense" conservatism. How else to explain its continuing and disturbing silence about the reality of ongoing corporate downsizing in the face of record corporate profits?

Commentators on all sides of the political spectrum have also questioned the wisdom of the promised Tory tax cut and whether it is consistent with fiscal conservatism to remove another $4 to $5 billion from government revenues, thus making the cuts that need to be made in order to balance the budget deeper than they would otherwise have to be.

Finally, there are legitimate policy questions about whether the best way to reduce public spending is simply to fire as many public servants as possible, which in turn brings greater economic uncertainty and added costs to the taxpayer, in the form of unemployment insurance, welfare and reduced ability to pay taxes.

We may all ask ourselves whether these things are examples of true "common sense" at work, just as we may reasonably question the "common sense" of a government which has promised, not only to reduce the provincial income tax rate by 30 percent within three years, but also to balance the budget in five while not touching "a penny" of funding for health care, classroom education and street policing.

But those who raise these issues without at least acknowledging the nature of the crisis we face, and how we arrived there, and with only the sage advice that the government should be somehow kinder and gentler than it now is, do a disservice to the debate.

Given all that, Rabbi Marmur concludes by worrying that in a society where common sense replaces God sense, religious institutions will only be "recognized as benevolent do-gooders and told to pick up the pieces of the damage done by government."

Perhaps he should be equally concerned with those who relegate themselves to the role of "do-gooder" through their own choice, through selective criticism which may well lead the public to conclude they have become political rather than religious partisans — and in trying to be both things at once, neither objective, nor fair, nor right.

The Law of Return must remain

By Emil Fackenheim

Post-Zionism," "Economic Zionism," "Mideast Benelux" — these and similar expressions have been around here for awhile, shamefaced expressions of non- or even anti-Zionism. Now the shame is gone.

In Life after Zionism (Jerusalem Report, Feb. 8) Hanoch Marmari cites a "provocative proposal" made by him a year ago in Ha'aretz, of which he is editor-in-chief: The Law of Return ought to expire in 2023, 75 years after Israel's founding. He expected a huge protest. But "not one reader responded. The Israeli public, I assume, does not care a whit whether the Law of Return exists or is rescinded."

I reacted with hot anger. Former Torontonian Avraham Avihai's Danger: Three Jewish Peoples (New York: Shengold 1993) shows that the Jewish People is threatening to fall apart into three, the Haredim in Israel, other Israelis and the Diaspora. Isn't this enough? Should the politicians help it along and scrap what, next only to the Jewish state itself, is the most heroic Jewish collective achievement in this century? And — still in anger, with a bit of nastiness added — like justice, the Law of Return is blind, admitting olim regardless of politics. After 2023, will the establishment then in power keep out those Jews who are politically incorrect by the standards then considered valid?

Having cooled off, I looked at what supposedly makes the Law of Return "out of step with changing circumstances." Trivial problems aside — such as can be disposed of by slight changes in the law as others have been in the past — Marmari's case comes to two points:

First, there are "olim of necessity" — in flight from persecution — and olim of freedom — from Western Europe, America and other democracies. In 1950 (when the law was passed), there were many of the former, now virtually none. And many of the latter were expected, but few have come.

The most heroic Jewish achievement in this century

Second, Marmari says, "Israel will return more or less to its pre-1967 borders, and in some areas population density will reach Hong-Kong levels."

I will leave aside the controversial prognosis of peace by 2023 and an Israel shrunk as the author anticipates. But a Mideast Jewish Hong Kong? For "life after Zionism," that is what the politicians are telling us, and they are already preparing. A new big trans-Israel highway, with as many lanes as possible, for as many more car as possible! Why not a train and as few cars as possible? "Maybe we don't need a beautiful country," an unreconstructed Zionist writes, sarcastically. "What's wrong with paving over a country?"

The new after-Zionism prophets sound like 10 of the 12 spies sent by Moses to explore the land, who returned wailing that it eats its inhabitants — except that, having found that the land is better than a cannibal, they set out to make it worse and into one.

The remaining two spies sent by Moses, Joshua ben Nun and Caleb ben Yefunneh, give a different report: the land flows with milk and honey. That they, like the 10, exaggerated a bit was discovered when the Zionists came upon swamps and desert; so they, like the present after-Zionists, improved on the spies and, by drying up swamps and making deserts bloom, made it yield milk and honey. But now, after-Zionists say that no more of them should come, that in "some areas" there are too many Jews already.

But there are not enough Jews in the Galil and not enough people in the Negev. There is still a place, it seems, for some Zionists.

Marmari mentions only two kinds — olim of necessity and of freedom. But since our 1983 aliyah, two further groups (or subgroups) were news to us. The bad news are the hustlers and crooks, who prey on all the others. But far more important is the good news — olim, whether of freedom or necessity, who expect a good country but, finding it not good enough, stay to make it better. Olim of this kind Israel will always need. If only for their sake alone, the Law of Return must remain, an essential part of the very substance of Israel.

The battle against despair

By David Hartman

The Jewish calendar has two distinct beginnings, one in the first month, Nissan, with the holiday of Pesach, and one in Tishrei, with the holiday of Rosh Hashanah. These two holidays of new beginnings offer insight into the meaning and direction of Jewish existence.

Unlike Pesach, Rosh Hashanah is not a historical holiday. Rather than focusing upon the destiny of the Jewish people, it celebrates creation, "the birth of the world." The theme of creation has had a decisive formative impact upon Jewish consciousness, for it teaches that what "is" does not exhaust what can be, that no moment of existence discloses the full potential of reality.

The concept of creation thus introduced the Jewish people to the idea of tshuvah and change. The essential meaning of tshuvah is that the past does not determine the present; a radical new future is always a possibility. Creation conveys the belief that it is never too late to begin again, that no amount of failure, set-back or suffering can remove the possibility of a new start. This is why Rosh Hashanah, the holiday of creation, initiates the 10 days of tshuvah, the period of renewal and regeneration preceding Yom Kippur.

If Rosh Hashanah signifies tshuvah in the life of the individual, Pesach embodies this idea in the life of community. The story of the Exodus translates the themes of change and new beginnings into historical terms. It is the paradigmatic expression of the notion of tshuvah in history. Pesach teaches that no historical conditions are final, that even an utterly humiliated slave people can be raised from the pits of silent despair to the heights of dignified hopeful human existence.

These two Jewish holidays of new beginnings prefigured and made possible the stirring drama of modern Jewish history. A battered people that lived for 2,000 years on the periphery of history could emerge from extermination camps and ghettos and choose to take upon itself the responsibilities of historical existence only because it never abandoned the individual and collective principles of tshuvah.

We re-entered historical Jerusalem because we never gave up the Pesach dream of tshuvah. Despite the pain and suffering of warfare and terrorism, the essential spirit that gave birth to this country and that continues to nurture its heroic determination is expressed at the end of the Passover seder in the words: "Next year in Jerusalem."

Although we now live in Jerusalem, we continue singing the words that gave hope to Jewish history. We say these words because ultimately they give expression to the faith that has defined the soul of Judaism throughout history: Do not be imprisoned by despair and resignation. Here in Jerusalem, we look forward to a future when terrorism will be a horrible memory of the past, when we can walk the streets of Jerusalem without fear.

Living in Israel, in Jerusalem, has taught me the opposite of Karl Marx's claim that religion is the opiate of the people. The God who liberated us from Egypt and brought us to Mt. Sinai broke the chains of necessity by inspiring Moses and Israel to dream of a world where the ideals of justice and holiness can become realities.

Singing "next year in Jerusalem," in Jerusalem, energizes us against sinking into passivity and despair and testifies to our eternal faith in the God of creation and of the Exodus.

Hawaiian journey

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Two years ago, I reported on my visit to the Hawaiian islands and in particular, my experience with the Jewish community. This column is a sequel, for my wife and I recently returned from another visit to the Aloha State. I gave lectures to the Jewish community in Honolulu (on the island of Oahu) and Kona (on the island of Hawaii, also known as the Big Island).

It happens that Hawaii is the name of both the 50th state in the Union and also of the biggest island, whose land mass is more than twice that of the other seven islands together. Our visit to Honolulu was sponsored jointly by the Reform and Conservative congregations; and that to the Big Island by Kona Beth Shalom, which is as yet unaffiliated with any national movement.

During the years of its independence, which lasted well into the 19th century, Hawaii had a highly stratified society, with strict rules, called the kapu system. (The word comes from the Tahitian "taboo.") The sacrosanct chief was truly apart from everyone: he must not be approached to closely; even one's shadow should not fall on his grounds. Women could not eat with men or even prepare their food; fishing and logging fell under equally stringent regulations. Breaking any kapu was considered an offence against the gods and always engendered the penalty of death.

However, kapu breakers could obtain absolution from the priest at the "place of refuge" — if they could reach it in time. Despite the evocation of the biblical "city of refuge" and the similarity of the Hawaiian word kahuna (priest) to the Hebrew, no connections have been found that would show an early contact with our people.

The Jews who live here range from young to old, and from those who are earning their living to those who are retired. No one is sure of their number, although several hundred is a good guess. The two major communities are in Hilo (where the university is located) and Kona, which has a lovely even climate the year round, with an average temperature of 26 C, and where the people enjoy a laid-back, slow-paced lifestyle.

Kona Beth Shalom Congregation counts 40 resident members who came here originally from the U.S. mainland and from Israel. They have one thing in common: they call their habitat Gan Eden, an earthy paradise. Adding to our pleasure was the presence of two "snow birds," at whose marriage I had officiated some 40 years ago, in St. Paul, Minn.

Measured by mainland standards, the state of Hawaii is distinguished by a remarkably low level of inter-group prejudice and is well-known for its mixing of races and backgrounds. Jews are part of this ambiance and their percentage of mixed marriages may be the highest in the nation. They hope that, with more and more Jews coming to settle, it will be easier to preserve the ancient heritage.

Hawaii's weather was very kind to us, and so were its people.

The passing parade...

Lucjan Dobroszycki, a pre-eminent scholar of the Holocaust, was the author of Image Before My Eyes: A Photographic History of Life in Poland 1864-1939 and Reptile Journalism: The Official Polish Language Press Under the Nazis 1939-1945. He was also the editor of The Chronicle of the Lodz Ghetto.

Born in Lodz, he was a Holocaust survivor. After the war, he was long associated with the Institute of History of the Polish Academy of Sciences in Warsaw. Following his emigration from Poland in 1970, he was a researcher at the Yivo Institute for Jewish Research and a professor of Holocaust studies at Yeshiva University, both in New York City.

Annie Kriegel, a French historian, was widely considered the leading authority on the Communist party in France. Her book, The French Communists, was the standard work on the subject. A member of the resistance movement during the Nazi occupation, she was a force in intellectual circles.

Emanuel Geltman was one of the founding editors, together with Irving Howe and Stanley Plastrik, of Dissent, the New York-based political journal. A man of the left, Geltman steered a steady course between his criticism of the abuses of capitalism and his abhorrence of totalitarian Marxism.

Solomon Liptzin, a specialist in Yiddish and German literature, was a prolific author. Among his books were A History of Yiddish Literature, Historical Survey of German Literature and Biblical Themes in World Literature. From 1923 until 1962, he taught at City College in New York. He was also a founder of Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv.

Ernest Geller, an anthropologist, philosopher and political scientist, wrote Nations and Nationalism, a groundbreaking work. Born in Paris and raised in Britain, he filled teaching posts at the London School of Economics, Cambridge University and the Central European University in Prague.

Emmanuel Levinas, a Lithuanian-born philosopher and religious thinker who made his career in France, melded Talmudic wisdom with phenomenology. A student of Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger, he searched for the meaning of Judaism and morality after Auschwitz.

Melvin Kranzberg helped pioneer the study of the history of technology and popularized it in newspaper articles. A professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology in Atlanta, he wrote or edited 11 books. He was a recipient of the Jabotinsky Medal for eminence in science and letters.

Elias Schwarzbart, a civil rights attorney, was the last surviving member of a team of liberal New York lawyers which defended the so-called Scottsboro Boys in Alabama in the 1930s. The celebrated case — a symbol of racial injustice in America — turned on nine black teenagers who had been unjustly accused of raping two white women. The trial led to two historic U.S. Supreme Court verdicts.

Jerry Cohen — a dean of class-action litigation in the United States — won two landmark cases. The first enabled farm workers to unionize themselves for the first time. The second established the precedent that sexual harassment in the workplace was a violation of civil rights law. In addition, he participated in the Exxon Valdez oil spill trial and in a case involving the leak of pesticides from a Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, India, which killed about 4,000 workers.

Simon Rifkind won renown as a trial lawyer. He was probably best known for representing Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis in confrontations with the author William Manchester (The Death of a President) and with the photographer Ronald Galella, who invaded her privacy. In his capacity as advisor on Jewish affairs to the U.S. army in Europe after World War II, Rifkind assisted Holocaust survivors in Germany and Austria.

David Marshall, a founding father of the city state of Singapore, was chief minister in its first elected government in 1955. Born in Singapore, he was the son of Iraqi immigrants. From 1978 until 1993, he was Singapore's ambassador to France. Later, he practised law.

Philip Piratin, the last Communist MP in Britain's House of Commons, was elected to his Mile End seat in 1945, only to lose it in a 1950 election. Piratin, whose parents were Russian Jews, was a fighter against British fascism and a London city counsellor for 12 years before entering parliament. In the early 1950s, he was circulation manager of the Daily Worker, the organ of the Communist party. In his latter years, he prospered in business. Piratin's role in politics and the working-class movement was analysed in a recent book, London Jews and British Communism 1935-1945, written by Canadian academic Henry Srebrnik.

Israel Cohen helped develop the concept of the supermarket in the United States. He was president of Giant Food, Inc., which his father, Nehemiah, founded in Washington in 1936. Under Cohen's direction, the food store chain expanded. Last year, with 164 stores from New Jersey to Virginia, Giant racked up revenues of almost $4 billion.

Stanley Shure was the world's largest manufacturer of microphones. As head of Shure Brothers Inc. in Chicago, he was a leader in the audio electronics industry.

Leon Schwab and his three brothers were the proprietors of a chain of Los Angeles drugstores known as a meeting place for Hollywood stars, starlets and starry-eyed tourists. The flagship store closed in 1983 after a 52-year run.

Charles Denner, Polish by birth, was a French movie star who appeared in films by Truffaut (The Man Who Loved Women), Lelouche (Robert et Robert) and Costa-Gavras (Z).

Morris Bruckman, an engineer, led the Grumman Aerospace Inc. team which designed the landing gear for the first spacecraft to land on the moon in July 1969.

Nathan Rosen, one of Israel's greatest physicists, was the founder of the Israel National Academy of Sciences and Humanities and of the Technion Institute of Technology in Haifa. For two years during the 1930s, he was an assistant to Albert Einstein.

Rudolph Peierls was an atomic physicist whose calculations paved the way for the A-bomb. A native of Berlin who fled Germany in 1937, he settled in Britain, establishing the department of mathematical physics at Birmingham University.

Sidney Hurwitz elevated the treatment of diaper rash and infant skin disorders into a medical specialty. In 1974, he and several colleagues founded the American Society for Pediatric Dermatology. In 1981, he wrote Clinical Pediatric Dermatology, which is still the last word on the topic.

Dick Steinberg was a sportsman par excellence, a general manager of the New York Jets football squad and a talent scout who had a hand in building the Los Angeles Rams and the New England Patriots into Super Bowl teams.

Jack Weiler, a real estate tycoon whose company has five million square feet of commercial space in New York, was a philanthropist whose pet cause was Israel. The Bezalel Academy of Arts in Jerusalem was renamed the Jack Weiler College of Architecture and a town near Israel's capital was named Kiryat Jack Weiler.

Ioann, the Russian Orthodox Church's prelate in St. Petersburg, was an arch anti-Semite who blamed Russia's ills on Jews. His source was the infamous Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Rabbinic Reflections

Family seders

By RABBI LIONEL MOSES

One of the classic barometers of the vitality of the Jewish family and by extension, the Jewish community has been the Passover seder. The seder has been for generations the quintessential family meal and home celebration. Indeed, the biblical ordinance that instituted the very first Passover, the very night the Israelites were liberated from Egyptian bondage, enjoins the people to select a lamb, "one lamb for each household, a single lamb for each family." (Exodus 11:3) Only if there were too few people to consume the lamb in one family did the Torah permit families to join together, so that nothing would be left over or wasted.

Among contemporary Jews, the Passover seder often fulfils the vital task of bringing families together, especially those families who are no longer all residing in the same city. In our times, this is not insignificant nor secondary in importance. Family integrity has long been a hallmark of Jewish continuity and as families have become more mobile and spread out across the expanse of our country and continent, the ties between sisters and brothers, grandparents and grandchildren, have been loosened and weakened, making families more vulnerable to assimilation and alienation. Passover seders remain a significant vehicle for bringing families back together.

Passover seders, however, serve a second vital function. The seder provides an opportunity for parents and grandparents to assume the role of teachers. The goal of the seder is for parents and grandparents to tell the story of Pesach, the story of the Exodus, through a unique combination of ritual and narrative. Repeatedly, the Torah reminds us that as adults, as parents, we have a responsibility to be Jewish educators. On a daily basis, most of us delegate this responsibility to a dedicated corps of professional educators. But once a year, the responsibility to teach, to educate, to explain, falls on each of us as individuals.

Leading a Pesach seder may appear to be a daunting experience, one from which we shy away. Few of us are teachers by vocation. Even fewer among us are Jewish educators. Lack of training as educators, combined with an inherent fear of inadequacy that we might not know enough, often frighten the most intrepid among us and discourage us from seizing the pedagogic opportunity provided by the seder. The results are that the seder is often reduced to four unanswered questions, a cup or two of wine and some matzah and horseradish that precede an elaborate family dinner.

The reality, however, is that it is much easier than most of us imagine to create a seder that is at once educational and engaging and also age-appropriate for our children. The number of Haggadot with detailed, step-by-step instructions on conducting a seder and interesting, engaging commentaries and explanations has grown exponentially over the past decade or two. Tapes are also available that record all the melodies — from the familiar Dayenu to the less familiar passages and hymns — which can transform the seder from a ho-hum evening to a delightful, engaging experience, fun for young and old alike. There are even books that describe craft projects that can involve parents and children in the weeks leading up to the seder, so that the seder becomes a sharing ceremony that culminates all the weeks of preparation.

Ron Wolfson, professor of Jewish Education at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, presents the seder as a play in four parts. Critical to "performing" the play is that participants at the seder be assigned roles that they "act out."

In his book, The Art of Jewish Living: The Passover Seder, published by the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, Wolfson describes over 50 different ways to make the seder more educationally creative and fun for all participants. Many are simple, such as lighting one yom tov candle for each member of the family or distributing nuts or dried fruit to children during the four questions. Others are more involved, such as creating individualized seder plates or preparing posters for each of the 14 steps of the seder. The results can be electrifying, transforming the seder into an educational experience that engages old and young alike.

This year, I urge you to be a bit daring and experiment. Begin by acquiring enough copies of the Haggadah for everyone at the table. Choose the Haggadah carefully, making certain that the instructions are clear, that the English is comprehensive and that the commentaries and explanations are appropriate for people of a variety of ages. Buy a tape of Passover melodies and introduce a new song or tune at the seder. And consider some creative crafts and rituals that might add a new and unique dimension to your seder.

And finally, don't be afraid of being a teacher. You and I might not be able to answer all the questions our children ask. That does not matter, because your family will discover that all of us still have something to learn about this, the richest home ritual and celebration of the Jewish year. If you believe in yourself, you can do it.

Japanese village recalls Rabin

By JACQUES BENDAVID
Special to The CJN

KYOTO, Japan — The long-lasting efforts of Yitzhak Rabin were recently remembered in a quiet Japanese village when a famous temple bell rang in his memory.

The large bronze bell measuring 1.8 metres and weighing 1.5 tons, located in a solitary corner at the Daikakuji Temple in Ukyo-ku in Kyoto, was rung by a senior Buddhist monk dressed in the grey-colored cloth of the order.

As a Jewish tourist, I was naturally so touched that I had a lump in my throat.

In Kyoto for over a week, I had not heard any temple bells before hearing this one. So when the evenly-spaced and gentle-sounding thump reverberated in this city of 1.5 million, I was surprised and curious.

It was not until the next day that I saw published in the Mainichi Daily News a photo with a caption proclaiming that the event had been in honor of Rabin.

It was a good deed and I wanted the temple elders to know that their kind gesture was appreciated.

With a copy of the newspaper in my hand, I asked a clerk at the Ana Hotel, where I was staying, to help me with the direction to the temple.

I did not want to take a taxi. It was a moment that I wanted to share with Japanese people. I travelled by bus and reached the Daikakuji Temple.

A young, English-speaking Buddhist monk appeared, smiled at me very politely and noticed the picture I was clutching in my hand.

"You know Rabin?" he asked, reverently.

"Not personally," I replied, softly. "But I have heard of his efforts for peace. Do you think I could see the bell?"

He eyed me appreciatively and said, "Yes."

I took off my shoes and wore slippers in keeping with manners of the religion. We walked together, very gently, to where the bell stood.

Below the bell was a thick layer of fresh snow to symbolize the purity of the event that had taken place the day before.

The bell is engraved with the words for peace — words Rabin had uttered in Jerusalem.

Konin comes alive

Konin: A Quest by Theo Richmond, Random House $38

This is the story of a man with a consuming passion. It is at the same time a stunning recreation of Konin, a Polish town, 125 miles west of Warsaw, where Jews lived, worked and dreamed for 500 years. It's where the author's parents were born and where the Jewish population of 3,000 was destroyed in the Holocaust.

Richmond tracks down every Koniner he can find. His travels take him from his native England to the United States and then to Israel. He interviews Jews in the most unlikely places: Dallas, Tulsa, Orlando.

What emerges is an immensely moving story, composed of the oral testimony of elderly witnesses, archival material and the author's visit to Konin itself, now a concrete industrial town. Not even one Jew remains.

A lost time and place are found again. Everything is restored with pungent life. It's all here, from the slithering fish in the market to the hectic preparations for Passover. How the Jews of Konin spent their leisure time, how they prayed, married and buried their dead. "How they got their water from the wells, and how a milkman had revolutionary newspapers in a milk churn. It's also about the small cheders or religious schools, the grand onion-domed synagogue and the numerous shtiebls, or little congregations, that accommodated all shadings of religious belief. It's about how tailors struggled night and day to eke out a living."

Of special interest is the biographical sketch of Leopold Infeld, the renowned physicist, who left Konin in his early years, became a colleague of Albert Einstein and furthered his career as a professor of mathematics at the University of Toronto. When he visited Poland in 1950, the Canadian Embassy in Warsaw, suspicious of his leftist political ideas, asked him to surrender his Canadian passport. Later, his two young children born in Canada were stripped of their nationality. The family never returned to Canada.

This work revives a way of life that, when another generation has passed, will be truly irreversible. Sadder and wiser, the author concludes: "Now the journey was done. Curiosity was satisfied, an ache assuaged. To say I felt regret at leaving this place would be false and sentimental. I felt no emotion. Maybe it was spent. Or maybe the town was releasing me from its grip, for I knew now that it was not the place that held meaning for me but the people who once lived here. Their Konin would stay with me always, a persistent echo."

The lawyer who stepped forward

By EVELYN BROOK
Special to The CJN

It is four years since I first spoke with Gita Goldstein, an observant Jew who follows Halachah and will not deviate from the course of Jewish Law.

Guest Voices

About three years ago, she told me that a number of people were helping her to secure a get from her husband, Israel.

She had knocked on many doors, entreating rabbis in Montreal and New York to help her. They told her that, regrettably, there was nothing they could do. Goldstein's husband would have to willingly come to give her a get.

I offered her support and she replied that she was confident the divorce problem could be resolved quietly. She did not want to hurt her children by putting them in the public eye and making their lives difficult.

How ironic then, that it was Israel Goldstein, the man Gita protected with her silence, who placed the family in the public domain. He swore before a rabbi and two witnesses that he had betrothed his minor daughter, then 11½ years old.

But the declaration was odd because this father did not state the names of the prospective groom nor the witnesses to the bethrothal, and the rabbi, Rabbi Yosef Taussig, did not insist that the names be recorded.

The outrage in the world Jewish community was expressed loudly. Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach reviewed the Goldstein case of kedushei katanah and prior to his death, he rendered an oral decision, a p'sak. Rabbi Auerbach invalidated the betrothal and the story appeared in the New York Times.

But other rabbis were slow to endorse the oral decision and some refused to comment. In general it was accepted that Rabbi Auerbach's decision, though oral, was verified and would receive compliance. The Goldstein child would be free to wed as if the betrothal had never occurred.

But what of Israel Goldstein, and what of his confederates who tutored him regarding the steps to be taken for the anonymous betrothal? What about the get for Gita?

David Stern, a lawyer in New York, stepped forward and began to make a civil case against Israel Goldstein and Rabbi Taussig. The case was on the court docket for Feb. 28. On Feb. 9, Stern was in a train accident. He did not survive. Gita's daughter asks: "Mamma, who will help us now?"

Gita responds as a mourner who also seeks to comfort others. She strongly feels the world should know the merit of her late lawyer. The following are her words:

If it was 'only' the terrible tragedy of a devoted father being struck down in the prime of life — dayeinu: it would be tragic enough for us to mourn.

If it was 'only' the terrible tragedy of a beloved husband being struck down in the prime of life — dayeinu: it would be tragic enough for us to mourn.

If it was 'only' the terrible tragedy of a dedicated lawyer being struck down in the prime of life — dayeinu: it would be tragic enough for us to mourn.

How much more so when the niftar (the deceased), David Stern, was a human being with all those qualities and many more. Ignoring social convention and waiving any fee, he worked tirelessly and compassionately for the joint causes of kedushei ketanah and agunot.

How he rejoiced when the slightest bit of positive information became available to him. How he lifted my spirits and fed me hope as my trials and tribulations and those of my young daughter threatened to overwhelm me.

It comforts me to know that Mr. Stern will surely reap his rewards for all the chesed he did, championing the causes of the downtrodden in this world.

But now we are bereft, without our earthly advocate. Who will fight our battles? Who will take our side? Who will have the righteous temerity to step into David Stern's shoes? His passing leaves a gaping void.

May HaShem comfort the widow and orphans of this blessed man and may He send comfort to us all speedily and in our times.

When we respond "Amen" we should also become a part of the answer to Gita Goldstein's prayer. We should all respond, "I will take your side."

Cookbook's proceeds to aid Mount Sinai Hospital

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The popular new Vitality Cookbook is going to provide more than just good eating. Part of its proceeds will go to Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

Frances Berkoff, a dietician at the hospital, and Monda Rosenberg, food editor of Chatelaine magazine, as well as publisher HarperCollins, Chatelaine and Mount Sinai itself are taking part in the Vitality Cancer Research Fund. It will be used for studies already underway at the institute which aim to understand the root causes of cancer.

Calgary-born Berkoff, who does outpatient and ambulatory care nutritional counselling, said she has always been interested not only in food, but in the clinical aspects of nutrition, especially the role food plays in preventing disease.

"Nutrition is connected to illness, well-being, even to athletic performance. It connects to weight, diabetes, cardiac and cholesterol problems, food allergies and pregnancy."

There is a growing awareness of nutrition among the general public, she said, although she questioned whether this concern is translated into practical terms.

"A study in the United States, shows that although there are more messages about good eating and more low fat food available, the population is growing fatter," she said, adding that there is no similar study in Canada.

One of the reasons, she suggested, is that in most cultures, including the Jewish one, food is central. "We often define our culture by the food we eat, especially on holidays."

Adolescents often go the other way, she said, putting too much emphasis on weight. "This reflects what society is saying about weight in young women."

Nutritionists are "trying to get away from the notion of 'good' or 'bad' food. It's the total diet, which should concentrate on less fat, more fibre and lots of fruits and vegetables."

When she and longtime friend Rosenberg decided to write this cookbook, they had certain goals: it should be user friendly, with lots of extra information; have easy and low fat recipes and it should be affordable — which it is at $12.95.

Congregation builds a bridge

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Beth Habonim is a small congregation in the Bathurst-Glencairn area of North York that was founded on the principles of liberal German Judaism.

Its name, habonim, builders, reflects its original members, Holocaust survivors who were "rebuilding" their lives in a new land.

Current spiritual leader Eli Rubenstein feels that its success is based on its smallness, its liberal theology ("that means it's tolerant to diverse views") and "a wonderful cantor, Esther Ghan-Firestone and an equaly wonderful choir."

The choir, which has recorded several tapes, "has had a major impact," Rubenstein feels.

The synagogue, in accordance with Rubenstein's own philosophy, bridges the line between tradition and liberalism.

"Tradition and ritual give an intense meaning to life, and a sense of community. The trick is to integrate it with life, not just once a week."

Liberalism, on the other hand, stresses an egalitatian, universal outlook on humanity. "It is the ability to take rituals and traditions and make them meaningful to us."

There must be "intelligent" change, he believes, not just for its own sake, but to make the synagogue experience and Judaism itself more meaningful.

The synagogue has grown since he took over in 1988. It now has a membership of 285, with a closed waiting list of 125. Its composition has changed as well, from older people to "tons of young families with kids."

Four of the synagogue's young people are going on this year's March of the Living, for which Rubenstein, director of young leadership development for UIA, is national director. One of the choir's stars, Rae Braeger, will be one of the singers at Birkenau.

There are children's services on Friday night, and high holy days, and special celebrations on Purim and Chanukah. Their religious school is full.

Rubenstein is constantly working to get more people to come to services, by making them more participatory, contemporary and spiritual.

"We keep the traditional songs, but I also come up with prayers that speak to people."

Instead of a sermon, there is a discussion. "It is more a dialogue," he explains.

One Friday night a month, Beth Habonim sponsors Yedidei Shabbat, a participatory, very informal erev Shabbat program.

The synagogue has not forgotten its roots in the Holocaust. It is one of the few institutions that has a Kristallnacht commemoration every year.

"We are very heimish," Rubenstein sums up. "And that's nice."

Two interpretations of biblical texts

TORONTO — Interpreting biblical texts is a necessary but sometimes confusing task, two scholars recently agreed, though they approached the subject from different points of view.

The annual Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education attracted a large audience to York University to hear Prof. James Kugel of Harvard and Bar Ilan universities and Prof. Nehama Aschkenasy of the University of Connecticut at Stamford address the theme of Text and Tradition in Tension.

Both speakers explored the ways in which biblical texts have been understood by different communities over the years.

Kugel suggested that interpretation was a necessity, given the importance of understanding revelation correctly.

His first example of a perplexing text was Abraham's odd behavior in telling Pharaoh that Sarah was his sister. How were Jews to understand the patriarch's apparently cowardly deed?

Kugel then showed how a seemingly craven act has been interpreted as divinely ordained and how such a "misreading" of the text has stood the test of time.

James Kugel

Nehama Aschkenasy

He reviewed the history of interpretation, which culminated in what he called "vicious," late 19th-century attacks on the traditional readings of scripture by "scientific" Bible critics.

He noted that scholars today have returned to a greater appreciation of tradition in relation to sacred texts.

Aschkenasy's talk further illustrated Kugel's description of the interplay between text and interpretation as sometimes harmonious, but sometimes hostile and tense. Her thesis, first stated in her book Eve's Journey, is that most biblical texts are not patriarchal, but later tradition demonized women.

Aschkenasy tried to counter both anti-feminist traditional readings and radical feminist condemnations of the sacred texts. She finds women's dignity and power in the language of the Bible, a notion which she illustrated through a close reading of the account in Genesis of Adam and Eve and the serpent.

The Wolinsky Lectures, presented by York's Centre for Jewish Studies, are endowed by the Leonard Wolinsky Foundation, in cooperation with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

Children get taste of helping others

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

You are not required to complete the task, but neither are you free to neglect it. (Pirke Avot 3:19-20)

TORONTO — On a recent Sunday morning, students and teachers at Temple Emanu-El stopped all their regular activities and took part in the Temple's second annual Mitzvah Day.

Under the guidance of facilitators who represented various city-wide organizations, students, teachers and parents were given a glimpse of what they can do to make the world a better place.

Martha Rosenberg, chair of the Temple's social action committee says that last year's event "was such a success, people asked for a repeat. We presented workshops geared to different age groups and different levels. People came away very impressed and ready to do some good."

Facilitators included representatives from Eva's Place, a North York emergency home for youth, who discussed what could cause a young person to become homeless. After the discussion, young people were urged to volunteer on the youth for youth committee for ages 14 to 24, which raises awareness and funds through special events geared to youth; or to join the community relations committee or make a donation (financial or otherwise) to the home.

Holocaust survivor interviewed

In another workshop, teens had the opportunity to informally interview a Holocaust survivor, who later asked them to visit the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, see a production of The Dairy of Anne Frank or arrange an outing to the Photo Passage at Harbourfront entitled Remain Silent: Auschwitz/Birkenau, by photographer Jack Burman.

Children from kindergarten to Grade 3 and their parents attended a workshop led by Community Builders, an organization that offers programs intended to help schools set up workshops on welcoming diversity, anti-violence programs in which young people work on reclaiming their personal power as an alternative to violence, or leadership training. Facilitators encouraged parents and teachers to talk to children about community — who is in theirs, what differences exist, what it means to be friends and allies to people from different groups and welcoming them to bring home someone from a different background.

In an arts and crafts room, young children constructed greeting cards which were later sold to raise money for the Hospital for Sick Children.

"It makes me feel good to do art, but I feel even better that my art can help someone," said one paint-splattered child.

Other workshops included understanding people with disabilities, responding to anti-Semitism and other bigotry, friendships and relationships, how kids can be agents of change, and Voices for Children, in which kids learned how everyone, no matter what age, can get involved in the community to improve the lives of children and young people.

Beth Tzedec marks its 40th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jack Grossman has vivid memories of entering Beth Tzedec for the first time. A third-generation member — now president of the congregation — he was 11 years old when the stately Bathurst Street edifice first opened its doors in 1955.

"I [experienced], as I do today, grandeur ... and awe," Grossman reflected recently. "The synagogue has not changed in that respect."

But a lot has changed, and as the shul marks its 40th anniversary this year (1995-96) with celebratory events and a retrospective display, the differences are both tangible and intangible.

The creation of an AIDS committee, an alternative participatory Shabbat service and expanded opportunities for women (allowing more family members to be honored together) have fostered a feeling of greater warmth.

"We are mindful of the importance of creating a community here. It doesn't mean that it didn't happen before, but there's more effort now," said Grossman.

The changes at Beth Tzedec — North America's largest Conservative congregation with 2,700 member families — reflect the evolution of Toronto's Jewish community in size and spiritual need.

In 1950, there were 40,000 Jews here; the population has since grown to 164,000. The shul's location reflects Toronto Jewry's ongoing shift northward.

Beth Tzedec resulted from the merger of downtown congregations Goel Tzedec and Beth Hamidrash Hagadol (the McCaul Street Synagogue). Both were established in the 1880s and eventually switched to Conservative Judaism.

In fact, Canada's first Saturday bat mitzvah was held at Goel Tzedec in 1950.

Goel Tzedec artifacts include a magnificent half-moon stained-glass window rescued from Beth Tzedec's boiler room. The eight-foot-wide piece, with two griffin-like creatures studded with chunks of glass, once hung over the ark.

Reflecting on today's Jewish population, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who has headed the congregation since 1993, noted that "Jews don't live in a compact neighborhood any more [and] people in many cases live farther from their homes of origin."

In response, he is leading members in "seeing the synagogue as a community [where] the congregation cares ... and tries to provide spiritual resources. I think people are more aware of a need for that now."

In 1955, Beth Tzedec was on the cutting edge of different trends.

It was very advanced architecturally, noted Jack Orenstein, Beth Tzedec's longtime executive vice-president. At least two synagogues were modelled on it.

"I think we were one of the first to use Israeli marble," said Bert Godfrey, a former president of Goel Tzedec who travelled in search of building ideas as part of a committee.

The shul set a local precedent by featuring high-profile speakers, such as Israeli prime ministers, in its adult education programs.

The late Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, who became Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader within months of its opening, was the driving force behind those lectures.

"It used to be that the synagogue was only a house of prayer," said cantor emeritus Joseph Cooper. "Rabbi Rosenberg changed the face of the synagogue to a house of study and a house of prayer."

The rabbi was also a force in establishing an on-site congregational day school, a forerunner of the United Synagogue Day Schools branch still housed there.

Rabbi Rosenberg, a charismatic leader, was fired in 1973 following a bitter contractual dispute that created unprecedented dissent.

The congregation began to regroup under the leadership of Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg, who preceded Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

"I think whenever you have experiences of conflict, you can look for ways to learn from them," said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

"If when you leave synagogue, you feel you have connected with other people and with G-d ... out of that experience should be a sense that one's life has more meaning, more focus. That's a big goal, and it requires a lot of work."

From left: Bert Godfrey, Morris Kaufman, Ben Hillman and Judge Samuel Factor took part in the May 1953 ground-breaking ceremony for Beth Tzedec synagogue.

Jerusalem's the secret of Jewish survival: Druckman

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish people have survived because of Jerusalem, according to Rabbi Chaim Druckman, founder and rosh yeshivah of Yeshivat Hesder Or Etzion and newly elected chair of Igud Yeshivat Hesder.

Rabbi Druckman was speaking at a recent Mizrachi adult education program at Shaarei Tefillah congregation.

Like the ancient Persians, Greeks, Babylonians and Romans, the Jewish people should have faded away, Rabbi Druckman said.

"In the zchut (merit) of Jerusalem, HaShem kept us alive, split our sea of troubles, brought us out of galut (exile), and saved Eretz Yisrael, in order that we can fulfil our goal, that 'Out of Zion will come the Torah,' " he said.

The eternal nature of Jerusalem, he said, lifts us above temporary problems and troubles. "Without that perspective, temporary problems can lead us to despair."

When at the end of Yom Kippur and of the Pesach seder we say "L'shanah Haba'ah b'Yerushalayim" (Next year in Jerusalem), "it is not just a longing," Rabbi Druckman said. "It is a real belief that we will be back in Jerusalem, in our eternal state."

During the time of the second Temple, he said, we fasted during Tisha b'Av, the commemoration at that time of the destruction of the first Temple, even though it had been rebuilt.

That is because "others were ruling us," he said, adding that several rabbinic sages ruled that we must tear our garments in mourning over Jerusalem, not only if the city is physically in ruins, but if it is under the control of others.

"In all those years [that we were outside Jerusalem], we always believed that Israel is our country, that Jerusalem is our capital and that we will be back there."

Many Jews do not realize the eternal significance of Jerusalem, he said.

"The real reason for all our troubles is that we are far from our Jewish roots, far from HaShem," far from the "eternal soul" that is Jerusalem.

In response to a question from the audience, Rabbi Druckman said that maintaining Jerusalem as the Israeli capital "depends on our own spiritual strength. If the world knows that we won't give in and that pressure won't help, then the pressure will stop.

'Educational revolution'

"The question is whether we will be weak or strong morally."

When an audience member asked what Prime Minister Shimon Peres will do about Jerusalem, the rabbi shot back: "The answer is that he shouldn't be the prime minister after the next elections."

The way to strengthen the Jewish people in Israel is through "an educational revolution," he said.

It used to be, he said, that when religious children finished elementary school, "they took off their kippahs."

Now, he said, "you see youngsters with kippahs all over — our youngsters [those from Bnei Akiva schools and Ulpanat schools for girls] are a model all over Israel, including in the army."

New cooking classes coming for spring

TORONTO — The Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with Vaad Harabanim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, has announced its lineup of spring cooking classes.

Three new classes will be offered and one class will be repeated by popular request. Two classes will be held before Passover and two after.

The demonstrations will be given by Vivian Anhang, a teacher and graduate home economist with many years' experience in presenting food-related programs to all segments of the community.

The classes will once again be held at the Shaarei Tefillah Congregation on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings at 8 p.m. There is ample parking and convenient public transportation. The fee for each class is $15, $10 for students under 18 years of age.

The classes include Elegant Dinner Buffet — Meat (V37) on March 12; Passover Demonstration — Dairy (V38) on March 20; Baking and Other Treats for the Sweet Table (V39) on May 15; and Gourmet Cooking Made Easy (V2) on May 21, a repeat of last year's highly successful class.

Classes are open to males and females. Enrolment is limited, with registration on a first-come first-served basis.

To register, send your name, address, postal code, phone number (home and work) and a postdated cheque for the day of the class to: Cynthia Gasner, Information and Public Relations, Kashruth Council of Toronto, 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3V2. If registering for more than one class, please send a separate cheque for each class and for each participant. For more details, call 416-635-9550.

Feuerstein to lecture

TORONTO — World renowned educator and psychologist Dr. Reuven Feuerstein will be giving the Susan Michelle Fogle Memorial Lecture at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, on March 14 at 8:15 p.m.

His topic will be Thinking in New Ways: New Ways of Thinking.

Feuerstein's theories about intelligence and thinking have had a major impact on the understanding of the learning process. He has developed the Learning Potential Assessment Device (LPAD) and Instrumental Enrichment, a practical remediation system aimed at developing cognitive strategies fo logical thinking and independent problem solving.

Feuerstein is the founder and director of the International Centre for the Enhancement of Learning Potential and the Hadassah-WIZO-Canada Research Institute in Jerusalem.

Dori Levine, principal of the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy, She'arim Hebrew Day School, which is sponsoring the lecture, told The CJN the school uses Feuerstein's methodology extensively in both the Jewish and secular studies programs.

For tickets and information, call She'arim at 416-633-8247.

דער פריילעכער יום־טוב פורים

פון מאניע ליפשיץ

מרדכי לאט וויסן אסתרן וועגן דעם באפעל און בעט איר זיך משתדל זיין ביים קעניג אפצורופן די גזירה. כאטש עס איז פארבאטן פאר דעץ קעניגיך צו גיין זען דעם קעניג, סיידן ער רופט זי אריין, שטעלט אסתר איין איר לעבן און גייט צום קעניג. זי דערציילט אים דעם סוד, אז אויך זי איז א ייִדישע טאכטער און בעט אים ער זאל האטעווען די ייִדן און אויך איר. אסתר פאסט דאן 3 טעג און בעט צו גאט, אז די גזירה זאל אפגערופן ווערן.

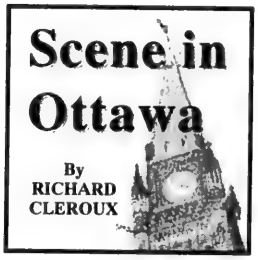
Keegstra conviction restored by top court



OTTAWA — The whole thing was over surprisingly quickly for James Keegstra and his lawyer Douglas Christie in the Supreme Court here last week.

After an hour and a half in court, the nine judges decided they had heard enough. And in a 9-0 ruling they overturned an Alberta Appeal Court decision that had thrown out a 1992 hate charge against the former Eckville, Alta., high school teacher.

They restored the original lower court conviction against Keegstra for spreading hatred and promoting anti-Semitism for 14 years in his classroom. Now Keegstra goes back to Alberta for sentencing on that charge. He could get up to two years in jail. He has already been fined $3,000, but the Alberta attorney general is seeking a heavier penalty from the Appeal Court in that province.

The Supreme Court decision brings almost to an end 14 years of court cases over whether Keegstra had a right to preach hatred against Jews in his classroom, even if he was wrong.

Keegstra was originally charged and convicted in 1985 with "wilfully promoting hatred against an identifiable group" but the conviction was later overturned and sent back for another trial in 1992.

In court last week, the judges heard only from lawyer Christie. They didn't even bother to listen to arguments from the government lawyers, nor from the two B'nai Brith League for Human Rights lawyers, although the judges most likely had read the written briefs filed with the court.

Christie began his presentation by trying to convince the court of what a fine upstanding man his client is, and how he really believed what he expounded to his students.

He began to stray off after awhile into an argument about how the whole business was really about whether it was possible to prove history or not, and whether Keegstra had really maligned Jews, since no one could really define a Jew.

"Those who call themselves Jews practise in such different ways," Christie continued, that Jews couldn't really be identified by their religion. Nor could they be called an identifiable group, since "many Jews are Zionists, but some Zionists are not Jews."

Then Christie went further and began trying to expound what he called "the foundation" of what Keegstra believes. Some Jews are "extremely" anti-Christian, he said, and there is reason to doubt the links between "Ashkenasism" and "the Old Testament."

Christie evoked "the slaughter of Cypriots by Jews" and noted that Leon Trotsky was a Jew and that the King David Hotel in Jerusalem had once been bombed by Jews.

If the judges were beginning to doubt what all this could possibly have to do with what Keegstra did, they hid it well.

However, Christie might have had doubts himself. He kept looking up and occasionally asked the judges if they wanted him to go on.

Chief Justice Antonio Lamer replied with a smile that of course they did.

"We want to hear you out," the judge said, adding Christie should take all the time he needed.

Christie launched into an explanation of how his client really didn't want to promote hatred, just "stimulate" his students by making them question their beliefs.

Christie described Keegstra as "the antagonist of the great power of government."

'Unpopular views:' Christie

Keegstra, who was sitting in the front row in the visitors benches, smiled in approval.

Christie continued. Keegstra had been persecuted merely because of his "unpopular views," he said.

At this point, Justice Claire L'Heureux-Dubé had had enough. "It bothers me that you use the term "unpopular views," she interjected. "We are dealing with something different here, with the promotion of hatred," and not merely with unpopular views.

Christie replied: "It isn't hatred if it's true."

Christie then advanced the constitutional arguments the judges had wanted to hear. He said the law should not force an individual to have to prove the truth of what he advances in a democratic society.

"Can the possibility of truth be overlooked because of the possibility of hatred?" Christie asked. If Keegstra is convicted, Christie said, "Heaven help" people in this country who expound unpopular views on such subjects as "sexual orientation."

Christie said a lot of what Keegstra had said was not religious bigotry because it dealt, not with religion, but with "world finance" and "the international control of money."

Finally Christie announced he was through.

The judges adjourned for 15 minutes and returned.

Speaking for all of them, Lamer thanked Christie for "a highly professional presentation ... as usual ... nonetheless your appeal will be failing." There it was in 12 words exactly, all of eight seconds.

It was all over for Keegstra.

Christie's face was drained. Keegstra sat motionless, a smile still plastered on his face. The press paused from their writing. No six-month wait, no long elaborate judgement this fall.

Justice Frank Iacobucci added that the decision of the lower court was "a complete answer." That meant it was all over. He added so Christie might understand, that these arguments had been heard the last time Keegstra had been before the Supreme Court in 1990.

The judge explained that sometimes the Supreme Court reverses its judgements, but not often within "the same generation."

"The conviction stands," he added.

Marvin Kurz, the B'nai Brith lawyer who never got to make his presentation, was thrilled. "This was a historic decision," he said, explaining that the decision shows that Canada's highest court upholds the constitutionality of Canada's hate laws.

It means that in the future hatemongers can no longer hide behind freedom of speech to spew hatred with impunity.

Alberta's Jewish heritage to be documented

EDMONTON — The Edmonton Jewish Federation/Jewish Community Centre (JCC) is forging a unique historic agreement with the Provincial Archives of Alberta, Federation president Len Dolgoy announced recently.

Federation's newly established Archives and Historical Society of Edmonton and Northern Alberta, chaired by Uri Rosenzweig, Federation vice-president for financial resource development, will gather material from the Jewish community and sort, catalogue and store it at the Provincial Archives.

Records will be gathered from individuals, organizations and institutions, and will be stored in the Provincial Archives under a Permanent Loan agreement, a privilege and service rarely accorded, according to Rosenzeig.

Major step

Under the terms of the agreement, Federation will own the material it acquires on behalf of the Jewish community, a provision which will allow it to determine any future relocation of its collection, such as in its own archives within the JCC or another facility. It will also allow the society to make decisions regarding access to such documents.

Sandra M. Thomson, director of the Provincial Archives, praised the initiative of Federation/JCC for its wish to acquire the documentary heritage of the Jewish community, noting that this will be a major step in the preservation of Alberta's history as well.

The costs of storage under proper condition, disaster planning and insurance will be paid by the Provincial Archives, she said.

Archivist Claude Roberto, head of the Private Manuscripts and Reference Services of the Provincial Archives and head of its business management team, will supervise and guide Federation/JCC volunteers.

The plan outlined by Rosenzweig will enable Federation/JCC to reach out to all segments of the community in a unified effort to gather and preserve personal papers, diaries, photographs, minute books, audio and video tapes, much of which is now stored in homes, basements and institutional buildings.

In addition, the Archives and Historical Society will engage in recording oral histories, so that the total Federation/JCC collection will be available for research, genealogical study, publishing the history of the Jewish community of Edmonton and northern Alberta and periodic exhibits.

Rosenzweig reports that a similar agreement will be pursued with the Provincial Museum of Alberta.

For more information, contact Rosenzweig at 16413 89 Avenue, Unit K, Edmonton, Alta., T5R 4S1, 403-481-1997.

New shul for Burquest

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The presentation of a new Torah by Morris and Dena Wosk to the Burquest Jewish community marked the beginning of a capital campaign by the members to build a shul for the Torah.

The Burquest Jewish Community Association was founded in 1974, but has never had a permanent home. The association has 175 members comprising about 60 member families. However, it is estimated another 1,700 Jews live in the area, says Mark Winston, association president.

Burquest serves neighboring Burnaby, New Westminster, Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and Port Moody.

The association hopes to raise close to $2 million to build a community centre which will include a synagogue, classrooms and other facilities.

At present Shabbat and High Holy Day services are held in an Anglican church in Coquitlam. Hebrew classes are held in a college in New Westminster. Social events are held in the homes of members. The spiritual leader of Burquest is Rabbi Yosef Wosk.

CORRECTION

In the obituary for Max Zeifman (CJN, Feb. 29), his survivors were listed incorrectly. Predeceased by his wife Lilly, he is survived by his children Esther, Sol and Sam, as well as four grandchildren.

Winnipeg's largest shul to honor founding father

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Rosh Pina Congregation, north Winnipeg's largest synagogue, will honor the late Max Margolis and his family at its first annual tribute dinner, to be held in the synagogue on March 24.

"Choosing Max Margolis and his family as our first honorees was easy," says Mchael Kaufman, dinner chair. "He was one of the builders of the current Rosh Pina building, a past president and a dedicated worker."

Born in Russia, Margolis arrived in Winnipeg with his family, when he was 18. He and his brother Hymie began their business career with a fruit and vegetable store in Transcona (now in east Winnipeg, but back then still an independent community). In 1932, they opened a second produce store in downtown Winnipeg, where their younger brother Murray joined them in business.

In 1949, Max Margolis changed direction and bought a small lumber yard. By the time he and Hymie (who joined him in the lumber business) sold Dominion Lumber in 1987, they had built the business into Winnipeg's largest privately owned chain of lumber yards.

Although Max Margolis supported a large number of community organizations and causes, his greatest love was the Rosh Pina Synagogue. He served as president in 1965-67 and was continuously involved in the congregation's activities for the rest of his life.

Max and Ida Margolis had three children — Sheldon and twins Gary and Gail. Two of them have been Rosh Pina board members and all three have served on numerous synagogue committees.

Kaufman says there will be a memorial dedicated to Max Margolis and his family.

News from Kelowna

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — Sandy Dore, a member of the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) will be part of a B'nai Brith study tour of Germany in July.

Dore, an educator in the Kelowna school district, "is one of the foremost advocates of dealing with hate literature in the Okanagan and is working with the school system to address problems as they arise," says an OJC press release.

The knowledge he gains through the trip will help him — and the OJC — in their efforts, the release adds.

In other news from Kelowna, the OJC welcomed the Jewish National Fund shaliach, Itzhak Fuchs, his wife Daphna and their children to the Shabbat service on Feb. 23. Fuchs led the service.

The JNF official encouraged OJC members to attend its cantorial concert in Kelowna on March 26 and also invited members to attend Vancouver's Negev Dinner honoring Jerusalem 3000 on March 31.

Fuchs said several members of the Vancouver Jewish community will be coming to Kelowna for the concert.

Snowbirds attend Hadassah conference

By MAURICE LUCOW
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — More than 250 snowbirds attended Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's "chai" conference held in mid-February in Boca Raton, Fla., national president Judy Mandleman reported.

Prior to the southern gathering, Mandleman had attended the World WIZO conference in Israel.

At the Florida session chaired by Marcia Shapiro, past Hadassah-WIZO president Clara Balinsky reviewed the 18 years of southern conferences, stating the annual event was launched because so many members were wintering in Florida that "we felt we needed a day together to keep us informed of our work in Israel and raise the consciousness of our achievements."

Keynote speaker, Montreal MP Sheila Finestone, told of her role as an international observer during the recent Palestinian elections. She said she was impressed with the manner in which the voting was conducted, "in an orderly and meticulous way."

Many women were in key roles in the election process, she added.

Finestone also represented Canada at Yitzhak Rabin's funeral, "a scene I'll always remember."

Mandleman paid tribute to the late Blanche Wisenthal, a past national president.

"She was a creative and elegant woman," said Mandleman, "and left a wonderful legacy of her achievements." A moment of silence was observed in her memory.

Reporting on the World WIZO conference, Mandleman said that although Israel's economy is thriving, its obligations cannot be met without financial help from the Diaspora. She visited many institutions supported by Hadassah, she said, "and I saw the urgent need for our continued help, made necessary by government cutbacks."

She said WIZO will support whatever government Israel elects because "Israel is our spiritual homeland."

The conference, attended by 600 delegates from 38 countries, with 15 coming from Canada, elected Michal Modai as president of World WIZO and Helene Glaser as chair of the World executive; Ruth Tekoah was re-elected treasurer.

Finestone was one of the members on a panel on women's political and economic struggles.

The Canadian delegation included, among others, Mandleman, Esther Matlow, Rochelle Levinson, Diana Shadowitz and Marion Mayman.

Mandleman said the conference was followed by a mission to Jordan "where the group spent two exciting days and was briefed at dinner by the Israel ambassador to Jordan, Shimon Shamir."

Blum Devor helps children in Israel

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — "As soon as you have mastered the language, you will no doubt be mothering the whole of Israel," wrote the clinical director of the Catholic Children's Aid Society to Mary Blum Devor in 1980.

Blum Devor had resigned as clinical director of Child and Adolescent Services, Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Health Unit, and was preparing to move to Israel with her husband, Berko Devor.

Until her husband became ill in 1990, the couple divided their time between Jerusalem and Hamilton, but since his death two years ago, Blum Devor told The CJN, she now spends the greater part of the year here. And she is still "mothering" the troubled and depressed in both cities and by long-distance phone, former clients on three continents.

A native of Montreal, Blum Devor is a University of Toronto graduate with an MA in psychology, specializing in child studies and abnormal child development. In 1962, she settled in Hamilton with her late first husband, Sid Blum, and their five children.

Soon involved at the clinic as a volunteer, then as part-time staff and from 1967, working full time, Blum Devor pioneered the use of volunteers in the treatment of emotionally disturbed children.

In Israel, a talk on child rearing problems to a women's group at the Jerusalem Women's Health Organization led to weekly meetings on psychological theories on personality development, and before long, Blum Devor was a very busy volunteer.

"It was my intention to be a volunteer in Israel," she explained. "I wanted to help the country."

She worked with drug addicts returning to their families after serving their jail sentences, complementing the social workers who were helping the families to adjust; helped establish a brief family therapy program; and trained a number of people who are now teaching at the Hebrew University.

Meanwhile, she also built up a private practice, but donated her earnings to Ezrat Nashim Community Mental Health Centre, where she did volunteer work.

Much of her private practice in Israel was devoted to work with depressed baalei tshuvah and with children of Holocaust survivors.

Peres vows 'all-out war' to destroy Hamas

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Within hours after a suicide bomber blew up a Jerusalem bus last Sunday, the Israeli Cabinet voted to implement a plan to separate the Israeli and Palestinian populations.

The decision to separate Israel from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip comes as the Peres government, reeling from a series of attacks by the fundamentalist Hamas group in the past week, vowed to root out the terrorist cells and destroy them.

"This is an all-out war, which requires unilateral measures" that must be "implemented immediately," Prime Minister Shimon Peres said after Sunday's blast, the third bombing in eight days.

"We have decided to give the war on terror top priority," Peres said. "We will use every means and will not be deterred."

The separation plan adopted by the cabinet at its weekly meeting Sunday includes constructing a perimeter fence along the line between Israel and the West Bank and Gaza and creating 18 crossing points to monitor travel between the two areas. Peres said $100 million had been allocated for the separation plan.

In addition, the cabinet approved the creation of a special force of 800 security guards to protect public buses. The guards will be drawn from former members of Israel Defence Force combat units.

A plan to deploy additional police and security reinforcements in Jerusalem, also approved by the cabinet, "has already begun," Peres told reporters. "We will fill this city with the security forces needed to ensure its security."

Police and soldiers will also be stationed at bus stops and hitchhiking stops throughout the country to check passengers, Peres said.

In a measure seen as an effort to deter suicide bombers, the ministers approved steps against the families of bombers, which would include sealing their homes and demolishing them.

Peres said this would bring an end to the "celebrations of the martyr bombers."

He said the homes of the two Hamas militants believed to be responsible for the Feb. 25 twin bombings would be sealed. The attackers were from the West Bank village of Al-Fawwar, near Hebron.

Peace negotiations with the Palestinians, suspended after the twin attacks, will not resume until Palestinian Council President Yasser Arafat takes sufficient measures against the fundamentalist groups, Peres told the cabinet.

But President Ezer Weizman, seeking stronger action, called on the Peres government to suspend immediately all negotiations with the Palestinians.

"The peace process will not run away; we must suspend it, until we find a solution," he told Israel Radio.

Weizman also urged all political parties to put aside their campaigns for the May 29 Knesset elections and join in working toward a solution to the security challenges.

Peres held consultations Sunday with opposition leaders, but he ruled out the possibility of establishing a national unity government.

At a time like this, "I do not differentiate between parties," he told reporters. "The entire country is right and left, young and old. I am convinced that we must first focus on this war against terror and I believe this is the first priority of all parties."

The attack came as public opinion polls showed a shrinking gap between Peres and Likud Party leader Benjamin Netanyahu in the race for the premiership.

Peres, who once led Netanyahu by as much as 15 percentage points, has seen that lead drop to virtually nothing after the wave of Hamas terror attacks.

The Likud distanced itself from the anti-government demonstrations that erupted Sunday after the attacks and called for unity.

"I met this morning with the prime minister and told him we would support the government if it takes intensive measures against terror," Netanyahu said in the Knesset. "I hope he adopts some of the measures I proposed."

Netanyahu called for imposing a total closure on the areas where terrorist organizations operate, closing down Orient House — the Palestine Liberation Organization headquarters in eastern Jerusalem — and giving Israeli security forces freedom of activity in all areas.

Arafat vows clamp-down on radical groups

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat said Sunday he would ban all armed groups inside Palestinian controlled territory, agreed to intensify efforts to disarm them and vowed to arrest gunmen in the radical Islamic movements.

He was responding to the three demands of Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

At a press briefing, he described the situation as "very serious and dangerous. This awful terrorist activity is not against Israelis only, it is against Palestinians, Israelis, and the peace process ... We will take serious steps for banning these persons and groups ... We will follow up with all our means," he said.

Arafat listed opposition armed groups including Izzadin Kassam, the armed wing of Hamas.

It was the first time Arafat had agreed to ban such armed groups, although they have already been outlawed. Pro-Arafat groups like the Fatah Hawks have mostly disarmed. Arafat has preferred to reach an understanding that Kassam gunmen would keep their weapons at home.

Following the Feb. 25 bombings, Arafat arrested close to 300 Islamic activists, according to Hamas officials, and ordered that unlicensed weapons be handed in. But police had arrested only two of 30 hard-core cases from a list provided by Israeli chief of general staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak last week.

Sunday's attack was claimed by a group called the Yehiya Ayyash units, after the slain bomb maker.

The Hamas and Kassam link was clear from a leaflet issued in Jerusalem, which said: "With this operation, we will stop our armed activities starting this morning, to give the Israeli government and the Hamas political leadership a chance to reach a ceasefire in the Palestinian National Authority. They have three months."

It added: "We will violate this immediately if the feeble General Security Service hurts Hamas or the wanted heroes of the Kassam units."

In a telephone call to Israel Radio's Arabic service an anonymous voice said, "The martyr was Islam Mohammed Abdu, 24, from Hebron. He has gone to heaven. The bomb was 16 kilograms. Hamas will carry out other operations."

However, the family of Abdu could not be traced in Hebron. The anonymous caller, who claimed responsibility in the name of Hamas did not mention the "Ayyash units" or the written statement's offer of a three-month cease-fire.

The attack also contradicted a joint statement issued last Thursday, in which Hamas and Izzadin Kassam offered Israel one week to respond to a conditional ceasefire offer and even repeated the offer after the government rejected it out of hand.

Most Hamas officials could not be reached for comment. Sayed Abu Musameh, a senior Hamas official in Gaza, who participated in the PA-Hamas dialogue in Cairo three months ago, said, "I am against the killing of civilians, but what happened today was a reaction," referring to the killing of Ayyash.

Palestinian clergy mainly kept silent. On Saturday, 25 newly elected Palestinian Council members condemned the closure imposed by Israel without condemning the bombings which provoked it, on the grounds that the bomber came from the Hebron area, not Gaza.

However, plans were underway by the PA to have a peace march in Gaza tomorrow condemning the bombing, a source in the PA Planning Ministry said.

Fawar refugee camp, south of Hebron, where last week's two suicide bombers lived, was placed under curfew. Peres ordered the two bombers' homes sealed, after the families accepted "congratulations, not condolences" at a wake they held after the bombers were identified.

War on Hamas

[Cont'd. from page 1]

The Likud leader called for a total closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, cancellation of all talks with the PLO, deportation of terrorists and closing all PLO offices in Jerusalem.

Both Netanyahu and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert repeated their appeals to the public to show restraint. But many were unable or unwilling to maintain the clenched teeth posture of last week.

"We want revenge, not restraint," chanted a crowd of demonstrators near the central post office on Jaffa Road, site of Sunday's bombing. Dozens of Jewish teenagers rioted near the Old City on Sunday night, beating an Arab bystander and damaging Arab cars and businesses.

Despair descended on Katamonim, as obituary notices were posted for another eight residents of this working class neighborhood where the Bus #18 route begins. Many residents faced a cruel dilemma, unsure whether to attend the memorials for those killed in last week's attacks or the funerals of this Sunday's victims.

Leila Shamshivili lost her uncle in the Feb. 25 attack and her husband in this Sunday's bombing. Other residents like Haim Amedi, Anna Shingeloff and Maya Birkan had just celebrated their luck in narrowly escaping last week's doomed bus, only to die in this Sunday's blast. Many noted the bitter irony of the number of the cursed bus route.

"Eighteen doesn't mean life — chai — in this neighborhood, does it?" said one resident.

Neighborhood council head Yamin Suissa warned that people in Katamonim would soon "rise up in arms" if something was not done.

Among the dead were nine new immigrants killed in last week's blast and another four in Sunday's.

"What did we come here for?" asked a new immigrant from the Georgian republic who lost a member of his family in Sunday's attack. "We thought we would be safe in Israel."

Some of the measures announced by Peres seem designed to boost sagging morale rather than provide a foolproof way to stop bus bombings.

"It's not clear how the deployment of soldiers and the formation of a new bus security force will stop suicide bombers from blowing themselves up," said one military expert. "The bombers will just take the security forces along with them."

"The presence of soldiers and police gives the public a greater sense of security — and that's important too," countered Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer.

Peres' decision to adopt the Separation Plan, which he has vigorously opposed in the past, sparked opposition from both the right and left. The plan calls for the installation of an elaborate network of fences and eleetronic surveillance equipment to prevent Palestinians from sneaking into Israel from the territories. Some 10 to 20 checkpoints will be constructed to process workers and goods.

Jewish settlers fear that the arrangement will make them more vulnerable to attacks by Palestinians in the territories, while left-wingers argue that the only way to enforce a separation effectively is through the establishment of a Palestinian state with clear borders and passport control.

Critics note that in Jerusalem no separation is possible because the Israeli and Palestinian populations are so intertwined.

"Even if the measures prove effective, we will not feel these effects until a year from now," said military expert Gen. (res.) Menachem Digli. "It's an illusion to think that there will be an immediate change in the situation tomorrow."

Digli also warned that the government was fighting "a war of the past, instead of looking ahead." Buses are just one possible target, he said, noting the potential damage that terrorists could wreak on schools and other targets.

Much of the real battle against terrorism will take place behind the scenes — through intelligence-gathering and infiltration of terrorist cells, culminating in the type of operation that saw the liquidation of Hamas "engineer" Yehiye Ayyash in December. Peres hinted on Sunday that Arafat's failure to crush the Hamas terrorist infrastructure would trigger similar acts.

Whether Peres is successful or not in stemming this wave of terror will determine his own political future and that of the peace process — which have both sustained stunning, some say fatal, blows in the last week and a half. Most analysts agree that neither the prime minister nor his peace plan can afford another bloody Sunday.

Rabbi Amital 'thinking...weighing the issues'

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM— A framed picture of Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak Kook and dozens of volumes of Jewish religious texts attest to the fact that this is not your typical government office. But then Rabbi Yehuda Amital is not your typical government minister.

The 71-year-old yeshivah head, who was appointed minister without portfolio by Prime Minister Shimon Peres, seems to relish the fact that he has no parliamentary power. "I am responsible to no party," he declares proudly.

Ask his views on specific issues and he'll casually tell you what no true politician is ready to admit: he doesn't know. "I am not a politician," he says, uttering the word with disdain. "Politicians have a clear answer for every question. I'm still in a period in which I am thinking and weighing issues," says the gray-bearded rabbi, who clearly prefers the scholarly way of approaching problems to the political one.

Meimad, the dovish religious movement he helped found, is to vote this month on whether to become a political party. Rabbi Amital's disdain for politics is such that he hopes Meimad stays out of the electoral race. He has already declared that he will not run for office under any ticket.

What's wrong with politics? "Politics is, well, politics," he says, and adds in an almost embarrassed aside: "It's not all that pure."

So what is a man who shuns politics doing heading a government ministry? Why did he accept Peres' offer? Rabbi Amital is a man with a message. And he is willing to go to great lengths — even entering the murky world of politics — to get it across.

"My membership in the government is a statement that support for the Oslo accords and commitment to Torah and Halachah are not incompatible," says the man who founded the first West Bank yeshivah to combine religious studies with military service.

That message — religious support for peace — is not new to

Rabbi Yehuda Amital

Rabbi Amital. It's what prompted his failed bid to run for the Knesset in 1988 as head of Meimad, a breakaway of the National Religious party. But today, in the aftermath of the Rabin murder, the rabbi says he feels an even more urgent need to make his voice — and that of his movement — heard.

"I felt there was a need for some sanctification of the Lord's name ... after the appalling murder of the prime minister ... by someone who claims to be religious and uses halachic language to justify his dreadful act.

"I was also afraid that the general public might completely estrange itself from Judaism and the Jewish people."

On the surface, Rabbi Amital's political views sound much like those of the Labor party or Meretz, its left-wing coalition partner.

"I support the peace process as a way of preventing bloodshed. I believe that the majority of Palestinians have finally adopted the pragmatic approach. They may still dream about the destruction of Israel, but they realize that it's not feasible. And I see no other alternative to the peace process."

Interviewed by The CJN just hours after the Feb. 25 double suicide bombing, Rabbi Amital remained resolute in his support for the peace process. He rejected the claim that the peace process is in some way responsible for the spate of terror attacks that have claimed so many lives in the last two years.

"It's simplistic to think that if you stop the peace process you solve the problem of terror. It's true that the dangerous phenomenon of the suicide bombings began during the period of the peace process. But the peace process did not bring that about. These attacks are another facet of Arab fundamentalism, which is rearing its head all over the world. It's primitive to link the whole problem to the peace process."

But it would be wrong to mistake Rabbi Amital for just another dovish politician. The co-founder and head of the Har Eztion yeshivah in Alon Shvut has had only four years of general education; the rest of his study years were spent in yeshivot. His political views, like everything else about him, are steeped in religious tradition. His spiritual mentor is Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak Kook, first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of pre-state Israel and founder of modern religious Zionism.

"My order of values places the people of Israel first, the Torah of Israel second and Eretz Yisrael third," says Rabbi Amital, who believes that in this respect, he is maintaining the tradition of his mentor, whose picture is prominently displayed in his office.

Here Rabbi Amital is at odds with most members of the national religious camp, who maintain that Jews are commanded to hold on to Greater Israel at all costs — a view, espoused by Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, son of the chief rabbi.

Rabbi Amital also takes issue with the growing tendency, particularly among right-wing politicians, to invoke the Holocaust in political debates. A survivor, whose family perished at Auschwitz, Rabbi Amital believes that the constant usage of Holocaust imagery plays into the hands of Holocaust deniers.

"If every act is a Holocaust, then what the Germans did is not really so terrible. Using such expressions as Nazis and Judenrat in relation to Eretz Yisrael belittles the Holocaust."

Rabbi Amital also believes that this practice ultimately led to Rabin's assassination.

"We've seen what happens when people call the government Nazis. It leads to murder."

Religious ministers are nothing new in Israeli politics. But Rabbi Amital is a novelty because of the way he sees his role. Unlike other Orthodox ministers, he is not out to obtain more funding for yeshivot. He does not regard himself as a reresentative of any interest group, but rather as a bridge-builder — between secular and religious, right and left wing, Israeli and Diaspora Jews.

"My appointment is a statement by the government that despite the fact that there is no religious party in the coalition, it does not want to alienate Orthodox Jews in Israel and abroad."

He also hopes to inspire a more positive attitude to tradition among secular Israelis. "The way my appointment was received in the secular camp was very heart-warming," says Rabbi Amital. "It seems that many non-observant Israelis do wish to have an authentic Jewish voice and seek a Jewish message that is relevant to them."

He rejects the view common among many Israelis that the answer to Diaspora Jewry's problems is aliyah.

"It's important to have Jewish communities in the Diaspora," says Rabbi Amital, who is head of a new Israeli government ministerial commission on the Israel-Diaspora relationship. "But Diaspora Jewry faces a struggle of survival today. Israel can and must do something to help in this battle by disseminating educational programs and providing more meaningful content to Jewish life."

When asked about recognition of Reform and Conservative Judaism in Israel, Rabbi Amital seems uncomfortable and reverts to the aliyah answer.

"If you want to make a difference in Israeli society, come live here and build synagogues," he tells North American Jews.

His unorthodox views, particularly on the peace process, have angered many in the national religious camp. Like him or loathe him, you'd better take a good look at this maverick minister now, because he won't remain in office for very long.

Rabbi Amital says that even if Peres wins the next election, his own prospects of being appointed to the cabinet are dim.

But if this reluctant politician will soon be out of government, he will not necessarily be out of sight. "I hope that even if I am not a minister I will be able to have some influence. I think that it will now be easier to get our message across."

(Editor's note - Rabbi Amital is scheduled to speak next week in Montreal and Toronto.)

Political career ends as Aloni bows out

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

There will be one less politician running for re-election this year and her name is Shulamit Aloni, one of the most controversial and outspoken figures on the Israeli political scene.

Aloni, the science and communications minister, announced last month that she would neither run for the Knesset nor form a new party. It thus appears that she is bowing out of politics for good.

An avowed secularist and the bane of the haredi community, Aloni was one of the founders of the Citizens Rights party, which merged with two other left-wing parties — Mapam and Shinui — in 1992 to form Meretz. With 12 seats, Meretz is the third largest bloc in the Knesset, just behind the Labor party and the Likud.

By all accounts, Aloni is leaving politics because her rival in Meretz, Environment Minister Yossi Sarid, who is more moderate, defeated her in a power struggle for dominance of the party.

Their rivalry goes back nearly four years. When Meretz joined the Labor party in a coalition government, Aloni took a seat in the cabinet as education minister, while Sarid was left out in the cold.

But within about a year, Yitzhak Rabin removed Aloni from her position, forced to do so under pressure from Shas, a religious party and a member of the coalition. Shas despised her liberal and iconoclastic opinions, and threatened to break up the fragile coalition unless she was banished from the Education Ministry.

Amnon Rubinstein — her Meretz colleague — replaced Aloni, who was shifted into the less influential science and communications portfolio. Shortly afterward, Sarid was invited into the cabinet, where he wasted no time in making a mark, particularly in Israel's peace talks with the PLO and as a Rabin confidant.

As this happened, Aloni drifted farther from the centre of power, both in the cabinet and in Meretz itself.

A lawyer, teacher and civil rights activist, Aloni, like Sarid, was first elected to the Knesset under the banner of the Labor party. Following a dispute with Golda Meir, who was then prime minister, Aloni left the Labor party in 1973 to establish the Citizens Rights party, whose chief objective was to curb the influence of the rabbinate over marriage and divorce.

In 1974, Aloni was appointed minister without portfolio in Rabin's first government. But before the year was out, she resigned, disgusted with the concessions Rabin had offered the religious parties in exchange for their support.

In the interval between her resignation in 1974 and her return to the cabinet 18 years later, Aloni burnished her reputation as a champion of women's rights and a critic of Israel's occupation of the territories and its building of settlements there. She was also an advocate of an independent Palestinian state and a proponent of separating the powers between state and religion.

When Rabin named her education minister, there was a great outcry from the dati, whose representatives had previously controlled the ministry. One haredi newspaper branded Aloni a "wicked person," while Rabbi Eliezer Schach — the eminence grise of Shas — labelled her an enemy of Judaism and an opponent of Jewish moral values.

Aloni said she respected Orthodox Jews, but resented their attempts to control the lives of the non-Orthodox segment of the Jewish population.

As education minister, Aloni fulfilled the datis' worst expectations of her. She disparaged their belief that the world was created by God. She described Israel's two chief rabbis as "popes." She called into question the necessity of maintaining kashrut laws in Israel. She referred to the Tomb of Joseph in Nablus as that of an Arab sheikh. She criticized Rabin for having recited the Shema Yisrael prayer at a ceremony in Warsaw marking the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

Aloni's views and her personal behavior outraged the Orthodox. "When she dies, I'll drink a toast," Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual leader of Shas, was quoted as having said.

In addition, Aloni offended another constituency, secular Jews who believe that Israel should retain the Golan Heights. In March 1994, she angered this group by advising Israelis "to start getting used to the idea that Israel will have to totally withdraw from the Golan."

This statement came back to haunt her in May 1995, when a man, reportedly a supporter of right-wing causes in Israel, assaulted Aloni at a breakfast meeting in Manhattan.

Much to the relief of some Israelis and Diaspora Jews, Aloni is leaving politics. But it is doubtful whether she will refrain from voicing her views during the election campaign.

Peres Losing Ground After Attacks

JERUSALEM — An opinion poll published Feb. 26 showed Prime Minister Shimon Peres losing ground to Benjamin Netanyahu after 27 people died in two suicide bombings the day before.

The Dahaf poll of 501 Israelis for Yediot Aharonot showed Netanyahu narrowing Peres' lead in four days from 15 percentage points to three.

The new poll showed 46 percent would vote for Peres, 43 percent for Netanyahu and five percent for David Levy. Six percent had yet to decide or did not respond.

Another veteran pollster said it was too early to conduct a poll unaffected by the emotions of the moment.

Labor Prepares To Take To Streets

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres instructed his party's ministers to explain Labor's stance on personal security in every public appearance they make. He also implored them to see to it that pro-Labor demonstrators appear on the streets so as not to "leave the streets to the Likud."

Levy Considers Likud Offer

JERUSALEM — David Levy promised to "study and consider" a new offer from the Likud last Thursday night, after he was about to close the door on any agreement.

This in effect marks the beginning of formal talks on creating a three-way bloc with the Likud, Tsomet and Levy's new Gesher Party.

The entire effort was revived at the last minute by a Tsomet concession which made it possible for Likud chair Benjamin Netanyahu to make a new proposal to Levy.

Labor Unfazed by Levy Withdrawal

JERUSALEM — Labor party leaders expressed no concern over the possibility of David Levy's return to the Likud, stressing the advantage of having only one election round for prime minister. Foreign Minister Ehud Barak said that if Levy ran in the first round, "he could hardly order his supporters to vote for Labor's candidate, Shimon Peres, in the second round. The large majority of his people would vote for Benjamin Netanyahu anyway, so it makes no difference."

Arab Party Applies For Registration

JERUSALEM — The Arab Movement for Change, led by Dr. Ahmed Tibi, an adviser to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, has applied to be officially registered as a political party.

Likud MK Dov Shilansky is asking Attorney General Michael Ben Yair to disqualify the new party and prevent it from running in the elections.

Shilansky maintains that there is a conflict of interest in Tibi's role as adviser to Arafat and his intention to run for election to the Knesset.

Girls seek cure for genetic disease in New Zealand

By LENN ZONDER
Connecticut Jewish Ledger

WEST HARTFORD — Roger and Helene Karlin and Mark and Eileen Mushin are going to the ends of the earth to save the lives of their daughters.

They hope that an innovative neurological procedure in Auckland, New Zealand, will deliver the miracle they have worked so hard to make come true.

The girls, 2-year-old Alyssa Mushin of Derby, Conn., and 19-month-old Lindsay Karlin of Danbury, Conn., suffer from a genetic illness called Canavan's disease.

A little-known, congenital brain disorder that ends in death, normally before the child's 10th birthday, Canavan's is a leukodystrophic disease that destroys the myelin, a white, fatty substance that forms a sheath over the brain.

Afflicted children — mostly descendants of Ashkenazi Jew from Lithuania, Poland and Russia — have limited ability to move their hands, play or feed themselves. Loss of sight is also common and the children are never able to sit, crawl, walk or speak.

The disease occurs when both parents carry the mutated gene.

In Auckland, the two girls will be the first to undergo the new surgical procedure. A small hole will be drilled into their skulls and a synthesized "normal" gene, mixed with a third-generation liposome, will be injected into the ventricular cavity of the brain.

It is hoped that the injected substance will be carried to the affected cells of the brain and the normal gene will take over the mutated genes.

The operation will be performed by Dr. Matthew During, the newly appointed chair of the Department of Molecular Medicine at Auckland University. During began his research on Canavan's at Yale University Medical School.

The entire procedure will take two weeks. Afterward, the children are scheduled to return to Connecticut and be monitored by doctors at Yale-New Haven Hospital and the Yale University Medical School.

"Obviously, we are hoping for a total cure," Mark Mushin said.

"We don't know if the disease will be frozen in place or reversed," he added. "If that's all it accomplishes, the procedure will have been successful."

There are about 500 diagnosed cases of Canavan's in the United States.

Roger Karlin, who is also an internist in Danbury, said he believes the number of known cases is low and that it is the kind of disease neurosurgeons learn about in school, but rarely see in their practices.

Many children, he said, probably die from Canavan's, but have their deaths attributed to other causes.

Spreading the word about Canavan's, urging people to be tested to see whether they are carriers of the gene and finding a cure have become a passion of the Karlins and Mushins.

"We want a cure for all children," Helene Karlin said. "It's more devastating than you can imagine to watch your child deteriorate and die. If you have any kind of heart, you can't want any other parent to go through it."

The two families have raised almost $150,000 for the Yale Canavan Research Project, turning a nonexistent research project into a clinical procedure in less than a year.

"For ourselves, we're hoping for a miracle," Mushin said. "But we need to keep the project going so other children can profit from it even if Lindsay and Alyssa do not."

Dr. Paula Leoni, co-director of the Gene Therapy Laboratory at Yale, said all the toxicology studies related to introducing the compound to the brain have been completed.

"We have collected enough data to prove the safety of the reagent that will be injected into the children," Leoni said. "At this stage we can perform the surgical procedure."

While During will continue to be the principal investigator in New Zealand, Yale's research will continue, searching for a more improved and efficient gene.

Leoni said the best that researchers can hope for is that the delivery of the reagent will increase the level of a missing enzyme in the children's brain and that this will decrease the "demyelination" of the organ.

Normally, children older than one year do not produce myelin. The researchers hope that the process can be stimulated again.

"It is innovative work, never before tried. I'm excited about the possibilities and hopeful for the children," Leoni added.

Leading liver specialist opens medical series

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The House of Ashkenazi is celebrating its 75th anniversary and Dr. Laurie Blendis of the University of Toronto Medical School was on hand to help get the celebration started.

One of the world's leading liver specialists, Blendis gave the first presentation in the synagogue's Doctor In The House program, a monthly series of lectures featuring medical experts talking about their area of specialty. The series was organized by Winnipeg liver specialist and Ashkenazi member Dr. Gerry (Yossl) Minuk, to honor the old time north-end synagogue's anniversary.

Speaking to about 50 synagogue members and doctors following the Minchah and Ma'ariv services, Blendis described the liver as the essence of the body. "When it starts to go wrong, everything goes wrong," he said.

Blendis spoke at length of the effects of alcohol on the liver and the research that has taken place. The good news, he noted, is that the liver is a hardy organ that can regenerate itself given half a chance.

He also spoke of the different forms of hepatitis and their long-term effects. While hepatitis A is very contagious, there are no long-term side effects. Hepatitis B and C, however, can result in chronic liver problems resulting eventually in cirrhosis and liver cancer.

For hepatitis A and B, vaccinations are available that are safe and foolproof, he said. He and other doctors are advocating universal innoculation against the two forms of the disease.

British Columbia insists that all children be vaccinated, while Ontario has recently made the vaccinations compulsory for all Grade 6 students. (Incidentally, he noted that the vaccination for hepatitis A was first tested in an Orthodox Jewish community in Williamsburg, N.Y.)

Before the lecture, longtime shul member Dave Silverberg made the first in a series of presentations on the Ashkenazi's history which will complement the medical lectures.

The synagogue was founded by a group of 27 Lithuanian Jewish families, he said.

Dark dance based on survivor's experiences

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you were to meet Allen Kaeja, chances are you'd find him affable, warm, friendly and good-humored.

A choreographer and dancer of some repute in Toronto's "new dance" scene, Kaeja is also the architect of a dark, haunting piece whose foreboding mood and intense theme seem so out of character with his personality.

Titled The Old Country Trilogy, the piece is based on the experiences of Kaeja's late father, Munniac Nossal, a survivor of the Holocaust. Though segments of the trilogy have been performed separately at Harbourfront Centre's Du Maurier Theatre Centre and the Winchester Street Theatre as part of the fringe Festival of Independent Dance Artists (fFIDA), the work will be performed in its entirety on March 30 for the first time as part of Peterborough's New Dance Series.

After that, Kaeja will take it to North Vancouver's Norman Rothstein Theatre and later will perform it in Halifax in early 1997.

Set just before World War II, The Old Country Trilogy examines European Jews' "environment, premonitions, the state of the community they're in," Kaeja said.

Part one of the trilogy, Sarah is based on the life of his father's first wife, who did not survive the Holocaust.

The piece combines a sense of loss and the struggle for survival, said Karen Resnick Kaeja, Allen's wife and dance partner and a choreographer in her own right.

The In Blood segment of the trilogy features two male dancers and tells a story Kaeja heard from his father, who after surviving Auschwitz found his brother-in-law, who'd lost his entire family. Felled by a disease, the brother-in-law died in his father's arms. "That story has always been strong in my mind," Kaeja said.

Old Country, a sextet about his father's village of Kutno near Warsaw, focuses on "a community that had been together for generations with layers of friendship and trust suddenly moving to a time of betrayal and loss," Kaeja said.

Although his work tackles serious themes, Kaeja said it "doesn't beat you over the head."

"I do the lighter stuff," Karen said. "Allen's an incredibly jovial character and the intensity of his work surprises me."

Between the two, the husband and wife team are a virtual dance industry, choreographing new works, training dancers, holding workshops for dance and theatre students and soliciting grants.

They're practitioners of "contact dance, a non-partnering dance [style] that's different than the (straining) 'ech' and 'uk' dance form where man lifts woman in the air and woman takes shape in the air," Allen says.

Allen teaches contact dance at the National Ballet School of Canada and the Canadian Children's Dance Theatre, while the two teach the technique at the School of the Toronto Dance Theatre, as well as at many performing arts schools and workshops.

They estimate that in the past nine years, they've taught a variety of courses to more than 11,000 dance and theatre students in Ontario, New York, Europe, Mexico, Venezuela and Thailand.

Their company, Kaeja d'Dance, has also produced Vancouver's Dancing on the Edge Festival, DanceWorks, Spring Rites, the Canada Dance Festival and fFIDA, among others.

Karen and Allen Kaeja are a quirky couple interested in life, in the show Auro Choreda. [Cylla Von Tiedemann photo]

On March 2 and 3, the Kaejas will host a public workshop at Dancemakers Studio on Dupont Street, and Karen is preparing to launch Estrogen, a duet she co-choreographed that honors female choreographers in Toronto. It will premier at the Damn Straight Studio and will run from April 9 to 14.

A former wrestler and judo fighter, Allen came to dance indirectly. While he loved "the all-encompassing physicality" of the sports, he hated their traditional training regimens. For relief, he headed to the dance floor, where he'd get a workout by boogying to the disco beat for four or five hours a night.

A friend introduced him to ballet and he "got hooked on the energy and the physicality of the dance."

Afterwards he went "headlong into dance" and trained at the School of the Toronto Dance Theatre.

Karen, meanwhile, was studying modern dance at York University. They met at rehearsals for a show.

When they married six years ago, they created the name Kaeja, using one letter from each of their six given names and surnames.

Young entrepreneur the Sy Sperling of the Generation Xers

By AMY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If Steve Mincer gets his way he'll soon be known as the Sy Sperling of the Generation Xers.

A few years ago Mincer, 25, became concerned when he noticed his hair was thinning. His older brother told him about a woman named Mariana De Oliveira whom he had gone to see with a similar problem. She worked with herbal remedies and scalp treatments that brought about new hair growth. Noticing the difference De Oliveira had made on his brother's hair, Mincer tried the system himself.

"I tried it, hooked up a half-dozen friends, they tried it and everyone boasted great results," says Mincer. "I realized this was the real deal."

So, like Sperling, not only did he buy shares in the company — he's also a client.

Mincer spent months on marketing and research before finally opening up Inhairent Solutions Hair Treatment Centre at 2066 Avenue Rd. about a year ago. Customers come to the modern facility to have the treatments and learn how to do it themselves. There's also a massage therapist on hand and soon Mincer hopes to bring a hair stylist on board.

The De Oliveira Hair Care System helps provide the nutrients, cleansers and stimulators needed to improve the condition of the scalp and hair for some of the 55 million North Americans who are affected by male/female pattern baldness. The system sells for about $500, but people are buying it and getting great results. The products are not aimed at those who are already bald, but more towards men and women in their 20s, 30s and 40s whose hair has begun thinning.

Mincer has client testimonials and a slew of before-and-after pictures — including his own — for those who doubt.

"I don't just have before-and-after pictures of the backs of heads, I have customers who are happy to talk about their results with potential clients," says Mincer. "That's been my best advertising."

One such customer is Allan Hambaz, a Toronto student, who is thrilled with his new hair growth.

Steve Mincer may not have found the elixir of youth, but some would say it's a nice start.

Steve Mincer is also a client

ISRAEL TO INTRODUCE "ELECTRONIC MONEY"

JERUSALEM – Israel Credit Cards (ICC) plans to issue Visa Cash credit cards in the fourth quarter of the year as the first stage in the company's plans to introduce electronic money, ICC general manager Zvi Meshi announced recently.

Meshi said card holders will be able to carry up to NIS 300 on one card, which will look like a credit card but will work like cash. The cards, which will be accepted at grocery stores and newsstands, will be "refillable" at banks' automatic teller machines.

The card will first be tested in limited areas, but Meshi said he hopes to distribute the cards nationally by 1997.

According to a market survey conducted for ICC in November 1995, 71 percent of the population use credit cards.

HAPOALIM A LEADER IN CUSTODIAL SERVICES

TEL AVIV – As a result of client surveys, Global Custodian recently awarded Bank Hapoalim the highest ranking for custodial services, says Rafi Ben-Ami, chief representative for the bank in Canada.

Hapoalim, the largest custodian in Israel, was the only Israeli bank to receive "rave reviews," as "clients cited a responsive and helpful staff" at the bank, the Global Custodian report said.

ISRAEL, EGYPT GROUPS SIGN AGREEMENT

JERUSALEM – The Israel Chambers of Commerce and the Egypt Business Association recently signed a cooperation agreement aimed at expanding business activity between the two countries.

Jolson Sings Again: What was it like to see Jewish show business legend Al Jolson at his best in front of an adoring public? A high-budget musical profile of Jolson, now on stage at the historic Victoria Palace Theatre in London's West End, seemingly rekindles that quintessential and electrifying spark that this most famous cantor's son was able to generate between himself and his audiences.

Jolson: The Musical succeeds largely because of the substantial talents of its lead, British actor Brian Conley, whose dynamic stage presence and distinctive singing voice are at once plausible and pleasing. The man born as Asa Yoelson in Srednik, Lithuania, about 1885 is well known even today, thanks to the legacy of film and recorded music that he left behind after his death in 1950. Conley's rousing portrayal has an authenticity that easily persuades us to suspend our disbelief. Sally Ann Triplett is also appealing as Jolson's wife, entertainer Ruby Keeler.

This is a glossy, polished production, complete with the quickly moveable sets, intricate staging and large cast that seem requisite elements of modern commercial productions. In the Radio City Music Hall sequence that is the grand finale, an orchestra is actually lowered onto the stage from above, section by section. Fortunately, most of the special effects add to the bedazzlement. Also fortunately, writers Francis Essex and Rob Bettinson have provided a sufficiently strong plot line upon which to peg the 32 – count 'em, 32! – musical numbers. Rock-a-Bye Your Baby, Swanee, You Made Me Love You, April Showers and Sonny Boy are only some of the immortal favorites performed.

Al Jolson

Jolson is depicted realistically as a gifted but highly egotistical performer, who, as his agent Louis Epstein (John Bennett) generously puts it, was not the easiest man to get along with. Unlike the two movie biographies starring lip-synching imitator Larry Parks, this version of the Jolson story reveals that his mother died when he was a boy of eight, and that all of his determination and drive and wilful stepping on other people's toes was in response to her heart-rending deathbed wish that he make a success of himself.

Although musically progressive, Jolson, like many Jewish entertainers, was fundamentally a romanticist with a strong bent for nostalgia. "It's my Mammy I'm talking about, nobody else's!" he shouts in the final number, My Mammy, unabashedly and soppily sentimental as he tugs on the collective heartstrings of the audience, who are by this time singing, clapping, jumping to their feet and dabbing tears from their eyes.

Jolson: The Musical, directed by Stephen Waley-Cohen, at the Victoria Palace Theatre, London. Tickets, $25 to $64. 0171-834-1317.

Chapter Two: While on the subject of London theatre, I would be remiss not to mention the fine production of Neil Simon's Chapter Two now in performance in the West End. This is Simon at his best, as he combines his trademark witty dialogue and intrinsically funny set-ups with the pain and problems that come with courtship and marriage after a first wife has died.

Tom Conti and Sharon Gless star as the two romantic leads in this production, directed by David Gilmore. Gielgud Theatre, Shaftesbury Ave. Tickets, $21 to $48. 0171-494-5520.

Judaeo-Spanish Music: Temple Emanu-El Willowdale presents a program of Judaeo-Spanish music at the Shabbat service, 8:30 p.m., March 8; the public is invited.

Included in the program is La Rosa, a new work for solo cello by Canadian composer Milton Barnes, performed by concert artist William Findlay. As well, cantor Anna Trubashnik, flautist Beth Zeitlin and guitarist Elliott Sairan present Manuel Valls' Sefarditas Canciones, and the Temple choir sings Ladino folksongs arranged by Sid Robinovitch and Joshua Jacobson, under the baton of music director Amy Gilbert.

In Brief: Tribal Productions Inc. presents Dangerous Liaisons March 13 to 31 at the Theatre Centre East, 142 George St., Toronto. This highly acclaimed play by Christopher Hampton (Mary Reilly, Carrington) is a gripping story of passion, seduction and betrayal in the high society of pre-revolutionary France. Directed by Sam Rosenthal, produced by Danny Webber, and featuring Eli Lukawitz. Adults, $15.

A banal journey around the world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The 1996 edition of the Jewish Travel Guide (Sepher-Hermon Press, $13.95 US) whisks a reader on a journey around the world in some 400 pages.

The book, published in association with the Jewish Chronicle of London, takes us from Afghanistan (which has less than a dozen Jewish families) to another Third World country, Zimbabwe (whose Jewish population hovers around the 1,000 mark).

But if you expect to find elegant, insightful essays in this volume, forget it.

Apart from a rudimentary preface describing the evolution of each Jewish community, the Jewish Travel Guide presents pared-down facts only — banal but informative listings of synagogues, organizations, hotels, kosher restaurants, supermarkets and bakeries, libraries and so on.

And since this is a British publication, Britain takes pride of place, followed by Israel and the United States. These countries gobble up 218 pages, leaving less than 200 pages for the rest of the universe.

Canada, for example, is summed up in in about 15 pages. Strangely enough, the Czech Republic, with about 6,000 Jews, gets a bigger historical introduction than Canada.

The Jewish Travel Guide is well worth consulting, but you should be aware of its limitations.

Ambassador for peace to perform at Pantages Theatre

TORONTO — Enrico Macias, outstanding guitarist and singer and indefatigable ambassador for peace, will be performing at the Pantages Theatre, 244 Victoria St., March 11 at 8 p.m.

Recently appointed to the UNESCO mission for peace throughout the world, Macias has for 33 years used his songs to promote friendship and tolerance.

Since he left his native Algeria in 1962, Macias, a Sephardi Jew, has continued to advocate rapprochement between Jews and Arabs.

Although Egypt is the only Arabic country where he has been permitted to perform, Macias is one of the most popular French singers in North African and Middle Eastern Muslim countries and is preparing for a concert in Jordan.

In Toronto, Macias will be performing songs from his latest album, Et Johnny chante l'amour.

Jane Corkin: Toronto's first lady of photography

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At five o'clock in the afternoon there are no signs that the Jane Corkin Gallery is gearing down for the day.

The gallery staff buzzes around the back offices getting promotional material ready, invoicing, cataloguing and answering a phone that rings non stop, while Jane Corkin, who has been called "Toronto's first lady of photography," fields phone calls from New York and Paris.

On this day, everyone's reeling with excitement. They've had a visit from a rock superstar whom Corkin declines to name. In an effort to protect his privacy she's cagey with the Toronto Star gossip columnist who phones to say the rock star has been spotted at the gallery. "Maybe he came to use the facilities," Corkin cracks.

It's no surprise that celebrities come knocking at her gallery door. The 40-something Corkin has developed an international reputation in the art world and is among the top six photography dealers in the world.

Corkin buys and sells vintage and contemporary photographs. Since becoming a private art dealer in 1977, she has amassed thousands of photographs worth anywhere from $200 to $325,000 (US). Serious collectors all over the world from as far as away as Australia will visit her gallery if she has what they're looking for, she says.

Compared to other visual art forms, photography is relatively affordable, she says. "It is still something where you can buy the very best in the field."

And it's also a good investment. Many of the works she has dealt with have gone up in value, she notes. "A vintage Kertész which I originally sold for $1,500 in 1974 recently sold for $250,000 (US)."

Corkin is also the Canadian agent for internationally known photographers like Richard Avedon, Irving Penn and Nan Goldin, and she represents a stable of Canadian artists which includes Robert Bourdeau, Carol Morino and Prof. Thaddeus Holownia.

They are top Canadian photographers who "have already created important bodies of work," she says. "My job is to get it out to the world ... The work speaks for itself."

Her marketing strategy is to maximize the photographers' exposure on the world market and on the home-front by getting their works into exhibits at major galleries and shows — "to get them seen a lot."

In 1989, Jane Corkin set the world record for the highest price ever paid for a photograph, paying $116,000 for an Edward Weston. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

Artists whom Corkin represents are in three shows now running concurrently in Toronto: Goldin's works are part of American Trip at the Power Plant Contemporary Art Gallery at Harbourfront Centre; Headlighting, Holownia's show, is on at the 360 Revolving Restaurant on top of the CN Tower; and Four Days in the Life of Quebec, a Serge Clément show is included in the O'Canada Project at the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO).

And there are always two shows — one contemporary and one vintage photography — at her own gallery, located in a renovated shoe factory on John Street just north of Queen. The 6,300-square-foot space designed by architect Barton Myers is bright and inviting with its bleached wood fixtures, sliding floor-to-ceiling room dividers and eight-foot windows overlooking a medieval-style bell tower in Grange Park.

Corkin is reluctant to put a dollar value on the net worth of the photographs in her gallery, but she estimates they're worth several million. That's a far cry from the gallery's humble beginnings 17 years ago.

Corkin opened the gallery, originally located on Front Street, with a $10,000 bank loan. But getting this money wasn't easy, she recalls.

"I went to seven banks. I understood how to run an art gallery. I had worked for two of the best art dealers — David Mirvish and [the late] Alkis Klonaridis — but I didn't speak in their [the banks'] language."

She says she did $250,000 worth of business in the first year and it doubled every year until the recession hit in 1982. There were many sleepless nights, she admits. "I had no idea where the money was coming from. I was always maxed out on my line of credit."

But she survived that recession and weathered a second one in the '90s to become one of the longest-standing photography dealers in the world. She attributes this longevity to her ability to predict trends and make business decisions accordingly.

The decision to represent a particular artist may be based on esthetics, but ultimately it translates into a business decision, she says. "Art dealership is a capital-intensive business. You can't buy the best in your field unless you put up money. The right to represent often involves putting up capital."

One of the most important decisions Corkin made was competing for and winning representation of the estate of photography pioneer Andre Kertész, she notes.

"His work was brilliant and complicated. Some of his pictures have brought some of the highest prices in the world market."

She credits David Mirvish, whom she describes as "a great mentor" for giving her her start and teaching her the ropes of the art business.

After graduating from Queen's University with a degree in art history and political science in 1972, the Boston-born Corkin, a photography buff since she was a teenager, was hired to assist Klonaridis and photograph the art and guests at the gallery openings.

Corkin piqued Mirvish's interest in photographs and in 1974, he opened a photography department, which she headed until the gallery closed three years later.

Working for Mirvish gave her access to the top art dealers, she notes.

She also followed his example as an art buyer, she says. "We were aggressive — buying the best. I learned from David it was never wrong to pay the highest price if you buy the best piece."

She obviously learned this lesson well. In 1989, she set the world record for the highest price ever paid for a photograph at an art auction, paying $116,000 U.S. for a 1927 Edward Weston photograph of a sea shell. "The room broke out in applause," she says, laughing at the memory. A year later she sold the picture at a 10 percent mark-up.

She reports that the most recent world record for a photograph purchased at a public sale was $398,000 (US) for an Alfred Stieglitz work. She possesses two great photographs by Stieglitz which she's saving for local collectors, she says.

"Just to sell them doesn't make sense unless the person does something important with them.

"My interest is in creating Canadian collections that have top world pieces. One day the AGO will own some of the great photographs that pass through my hands."

U.S. coach aims to slay the Canadian giant ...

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's hard to imagine the United States playing the role of David to Canada's Goliath, but in the world of hockey, it may take the efforts of one or more goaltending Davids to slay the Canadian hockey giant.

David Littman and David Israel are two puck-stopping netminders toiling in the International Hockey League (the I) who could form the backbone for the U.S. hockey entry in the 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel, says Sam Greenblatt, the man charged with putting together the American team.

Greenblatt, 62, said he plans to recruit the best available athletes for the competition — and that includes "pros and the top U.S. college players."

He's already elicited considerable interest from Mike Hartman, a former NHLer who played for Buffalo, Winnipeg and the Rangers and who now skates for Orlando in the I.

And he expects he'll be able to convince other top Jewish players, perhaps including Islander defenceman Matthieu Schneider, to participate. And why not?, he says. "It's a historical moment because it's part of the Maccabiah Games for the first time...It's playing for a national team. It's playing for your heart. It's a great feeling."

When it comes to putting on national colors and playing for your country, Greenblatt knows of what he speaks. From 1987 to 1995, he served as coach-in-chief for U.S.A. Hockey, the governing body for amateur hockey in the Excited States. A master's coach (he coaches the coaches), he's served with the U.S. national program since 1977 and helped put together the 1980 and 1988 Olympic teams.

The 1980 team that beat the favored Soviets in the fabled "Miracle on Ice" was a career highlight for Greenblatt, especially since Detroit-area players, including defenceman Ken Morrow, played such key roles in the upset win.

A resident of Southfield, Mich., a Detroit suburb, Greenblatt says a victory in the first-ever Maccabiah Games hockey competition would be the crowning glory of his hockey career.

His co-chair for the U.S. Maccabiah hockey program is Ilene Kent, who works in merchandising and marketing for the NHL in New York.

Originally from the Dundas/Runneymede area of Toronto's West End, Greenblatt's family moved to the Detroit area when he was 10. He got his start playing bantam-age hockey and continued to the senior level.

Known as one of the builders of community hockey in Detroit, 20 years ago Greenblatt envisioned icing a local Jewish hockey team with players' jerseys emblazoned with a menorah. He was told at the time, however, that hockey wasn't a sport for Jewish boys.

Things have certainly changed since then and with the inclusion of hockey at the Maccabiah Games, Greenblatt's got his work cut out for him, recruiting prospects, staging tryouts and trying to raised the $250,000 needed for the team and staff.

In addition to recruiting a Maccabiah team, Greenblatt said he hopes to form a 20-and-under squad and challenge Canada in a friendly competition in North America.

Sam Greenblatt

...but not if Lee can help it

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gideon Lee knows what it's like to start an organization from the ground up.

A few years ago, he got a call from his son Ido in Israel, who informed him the coach of Israel's national hockey team had resigned about a week and a half before the team's first-ever international tournament and, ahem, did he know anybody who would take the job?

Ido had called the right guy. Lee the elder happened to know someone who was available — himself. A native Israeli who'd coached and managed kids' teams at various levels in the Metro Toronto Hockey League (MTHL), Lee joined the team in South Africa for its hockey debut.

He coached the Israeli nationals for its first three years and points with pride to the fact that it improved with every outing.

Now he's been handed another hockey assignment and, as before, it means starting something from ground zero. Lee has been named Maccabi Canada's chair of hockey for Ontario and the West. He's been asked to help put together the team that will represent Canada when hockey makes its debut at the 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel. But unlike the situation of a few years ago, he's got a year and a half, not a week and a half, to get the team ready.

Still, it's a formidable task, considering that hockey is a new sport for Maccabi Canada and has no organizational history, he said.

He's started by trying to recruit a three-person committee to take over the crucial fundraising aspect of the venture (the goal is $150,000), while he beats the bushes for talent.

He's also trying to recruit volunteers to help with the administrative aspects of the organization. Tryouts must be arranged, ice time booked and player leads followed up, he said.

So far, in the two months since Maccabi Canada touted the inclusion of hockey in the games, about 35 players have approached Lee requesting tryouts. Lee expects "a flood of applications" from across the country when the first tryouts are announced. He hopes to have a core of players selected by the end of the summer and he hints there's even a chance pro players and junior stars might be included.

Thirty-one years ago when he moved to Canada from Israel, Lee couldn't have imagined becoming a hockey czar. In fact, he'd never even seen a game being played.

But when winter came, his sons Ido and Uzi wanted to skate. As youngsters — tykes or mites, Lee doesn't remember which — they joined MTHL clubs and "somebody had to take them and bring them.

"That's how I first saw hockey. I figured that if someone is giving time for my kids, I'll give something back."

Lee eventually became manager of a house league and took MTHL coaching courses at the same time. He then began coaching a house league team.

During his coaching career, he coached a Goulding Park AA peewee team at a tournament in Quebec, where they knocked of higher-rated competition.

Eventually he served as president of the Goulding Park hockey association and he also coached and managed the (now defunct) Downsview Beavers midget entry in the MTHL.

"I got hooked on hockey," he says.

Although he no longer coaches (he was replaced as coach of the Israeli nationals two seasons ago), he readily accepted the Maccabi offer, which he considers a labor of love.

For more information, Lee can be reached by fax at 416-223-4041.

Beyond the security issue

By SHLOMO AVINERI
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Opinion

Two aspects of the debate over the closure of the territories need serious consideration.

The first concerns terminology, but its implications go much deeper than that.

The word closure is a misnomer. Israel could impose a closure on the West Bank and Gaza as long as these areas were under its military rule. But in the wake of the Oslo accords, it has become clear that the territories now under the jurisdiction of the Palestinian Authority have a different status. Even though Israel retains overall security responsibility in a number of ways, these territories are no longer part of Israeli space.

When we refer to "closure" today, therefore, what we are really talking about is the nature of the border between Israel and the areas under the Palestinian Authority's control. And the issue isn't "closing off" territories under our military administration, it's what happens at those border crossings.

Like any sovereign nation, Israel has the right to determine the conditions of entry to and exit from its territory, according to security, political or economic considerations.

Second and more important: The issues involved in Israel's policies regarding its border crossings should not be considered purely under the rubric of security.

Even Sunday's bus bombing in Jerusalem should alert us to the fact that the issue transcends security.

The question goes to the heart of the nature of our relationship with the Palestinians.

Given so many decades of war and enmity, it is totally unrealistic to expect a swift transition to the kind of relations that exist among the Benelux countries.

That is why any analogy with Western European countries is, for the moment, irrelevant.

The enormous economic gaps between Israel and the Palestinian territories make any attempt at economic integration equally meaningless unless one is thinking in terms of a Bantustan emerging on the Israel's doorstep.

Surely this is not the shape of peace and reconciliation. Nor is unemployment the cause of terrorism.

The Palestinians need economic development. But making them the hewers of wood and drawers of water for a developed, modern Israeli economy isn't the right way to go about it. It should be the responsibility of the Arab world and of the Palestinian diaspora to help the emerging Palestinian entity develop economically.

To put it bluntly: Despite the obvious interest of some Israeli employers in cheap, non-unionized Palestinian labor, there is no intrinsic Israeli interest in this. Nor does Israel owe the Palestinians a living.

So long as they were under Israeli occupation, we had that responsibility but not any more. Once the Palestinians achieved self-rule, Israel's responsibility ceased.

This ought to be stated clearly and equivocally to Israeli employers, who parade their exploitative self-interest under the cloak of caring for unemployed Palestinians; and to Israeli and other civil rights advocates who are justly concerned about economic conditions in the territories. They need to be told that the address for their complaints is not Israel.

Last but not least, it needs to be stated to the Palestinians themselves. They finally need to realize that responsibility goes with self-rule. Their continuing gripes against Israel are a continuation of the dependency syndrome. They and those Israelis who would like to continue a relationship of hegemony toward the Palestinians, calling it "cooperation" now have to realize that we are at a crossroads leading toward a new kind of relationship between our two peoples.

Under difficult conditions, the Palestinians have achieved a measure of self-rule which will hopefully lead them toward complete emancipation from Israeli domination. But economic dependency mustn't replace political and military occupation.

Palestinian self-reliance must be enlarged with the help of Arab solidarity, and Palestinian leaders, who for decades were able to mobilize the whole Arab world on their behalf in their fight against Israel, must now rely on that same Arab solidarity in their moment of hope.

Even under the present complicated conditions, ending Israeli rule over two million Palestinians was a necessary step, and a great achievement.

It was a twofold emancipation, freeing Palestinians from Israeli rule and freeing Israelis from the political and moral burden of ruling another nation against its will.

The more separation that can now be achieved between the two populations and the two economies, the better the chances for cooperation with equality and mutual self-respect in the future.

Terrorist network restored: officials

By STEVE RODAN and BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hamas has restored its terrorist network in Jerusalem and its members are believed to have provided support for the two suicide bombings in the capital over the last eight days, security sources said on Sunday.

The sources said that only weeks after the capture of a Hamas cell responsible for the planning of several bus bombings, including that in Ramot Eshkol last year, the organization has rebuilt its terrorist network in Jerusalem.

For several weeks, security officials had expressed concern that Hamas was returning to Jerusalem, but since the two suicide bombings, they are now said to be convinced that the organization's infrastructure has been restored.

Security sources said Hamas terrorists in Jerusalem are in close contact with those in the territories who sent the suicide bombers on their mission. The Jerusalem cell, the sources said, probably provided the suicide bombers with last-minute instructions and intelligence, and even the explosives necessary for the attacks.

"You just don't bring in 15 or 30 kilograms of TNT on your back or put it on your lap in a taxi cab," a security source said. "It is likely that these things are prepared the minute you are about to embark on your mission."

Please feel free to call The CJN and make requests for a favorite dish - we will try to answer. ENJOY!

Dear Ella,

Judy and I practically grew up together. We were best friends through high school and went on to university together. After we met our spouses, we started to grow apart. Judy and my husband did not get along. At one point there was a major blow up and Judy and I parted with bad feelings between us.

About 20 years have gone by and I've heard that Judy has a terminal illness. I suddenly feel that those 20 years that we've lost touch never happened. When I think of Judy, I think of all the fun times we had, not the end of our relationship, when things went sour.

I want to call her, I want to see how she is, I want to be there for her. Do you think I am being selfish? Maybe the last thing Judy needs, is me back in her life. Maybe her memories are not quite as fond as mine are. Do you think I want to call her just to relieve my guilt? I don't know what I would do if she refused to speak to me? Is it appropriate for me to call her after all this time?

Left Behind

Dear Left Behind

Try putting yourself in Judy's place. Do you think that you would object to a phone call from someone who was a close friend in the past? From the sound of your letter I think you would welcome it. When you are faced with a terminal illness, your priorities change. I'm not so sure the argument the two of you had 20 years ago will be important any longer. Judy and you have shared many years of closeness and fun together.

The worst scenario is that Judy will not speak to you...So? You will probably recuperate from that, however if you don't call her, you may regret it for many years to come.

Go with your gut instinct. Pick up the phone and give Judy a call. You may be able to rekindle something very special that the two of you once shared together.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems consult a professional.

Canada to act against terror

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian government has promised to undertake a series of initiatives that would put it in the forefront of the international effort to support Israel in its battle against Islamic terrorists, the head of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said last week.

On the domestic front, Canada has pledged to investigate whether funds are being raised in Canada to support Hamas terrorists, said CIC national chair Steven Victor. Victor and a CIC delegation met separately with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Solicitor General Herb Gray shortly after three suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv claimed about 60 lives.

On the international scene, Axworthy and Prime Minster Jean Chrétien were to represent Canada this week at a hastily-convened Summit of the Peacemakers in Sharm el-Sheikh, Egypt. About 30 countries were to participate in the summit, which was co-chaired by U.S. President Bill Clinton and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

The summit was aimed at showing solidarity with Israeli and Arab peacemakers during the current crisis, maintaining the momentum of the peace process and discussing cooperative measures to counter terrorism, a government official told The CJN.

Though the summit was to last only three hours, Canada planned to urge other states to show support for the anti-terrorism measures approved by the P-8 nations (the G-7 plus Russia) at a Dec. 12 ministerial meeting in Ottawa, the official stated.

The international meeting will also have symbolic value for all those trying to cope with international terrorism and give Israel "a shot in the arm," said Foreign Affairs spokesperson Rodney Moore.

"Canada has been active in both the peace process and the struggle against international terrorism," Chrétien said. "We will not stand idly by and let terrorists attempt to destroy the peace process and everything that has already been accomplished."

Shortly after the terrorist bombings, parliament unanimously adopted a resolution condemning the attacks and stating that "Canada and the people of Canada [will] make every effort to ensure that the enemies of the peace process will not prevail."

Representatives of all major parliamentary parties took turns expressing their outrage at the bombings and affirming their solidarity with the people of Israel.

In his remarks to parliament, Axworthy noted that "the issue of terrorist funding was raised in question period regarding the extent of the problem in Canada. We do not know how far, how modest or how great, but whatever the amount, we know they can be important to the groups themselves. Therefore, we are committed to doing all we can to deprive terrorists of this funding."

'I am convinced we shall prevail'

BY CHAIM HERZOG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Commentary

Forty-eight years ago I experienced the bombing of the Jewish Agency building, in which my wife was very seriously injured. Twelve people were killed and many wounded. It came in the wake of two other major explosions in Jerusalem within the same month: One destroyed the building of the Palestine Post, as the Jerusalem Post was then called, the other, on Ben-Yehuda Street, killed over 50 people and left large numbers wounded.

In the Palestine Post explosion, I was one of the rescue workers. My wife and I survived the Ben-Yehuda explosion miraculously. We passed the truck loaded with dynamite exactly one minute before it blew up.

These tragic events recall many others. At the onset of the War of Independence, as we struggled literally for our very existence, we faced many harrowing trials and tribulations.

We had endured a siege in Jerusalem without water and food, as 10,000 shells landed in the city. But we survived it with determination, and in most cases succeeded in brushing off the feeling of danger, both national and personal.

I do not remember any case of publicly expressed fear or hopelessness perhaps because we experienced reality firsthand, and not through television at home.

Today, our capabilities are more extensive and our situation bears no relation to that which we experienced then. But much can be done to lift the nation's spirit, to strengthen its faith in the righteousness of its path and bolster its ability to meet challenges.

The News In Brief

International

ISRAEL

Haifa U's New VP

HAIFA – Haifa University's executive committee has named Yael Metser as vice-president for public relations and resource development.

She is the first woman to be appointed to the vice-presidency at the university and one of the few women to occupy an administrative postion at this top level in Israel's higher education system.

WORLD

Aid For Jordan

WASHINGTON – Jordan came one step closer to receiving promised U.S. fighter jets when President Bill Clinton asked Congress to set aside part of the defence budget for the military hardware.

Under the proposal, the Defence Department would shift $140 million slated for research and development to pay for the jets. An additional $60 million would come from aid already slated to go to Jordan.

Economic Accord Adopted

BRUSSELS — The legislative branch of the European Union has given its formal approval to a new association agreement signed last November by Israel and the union's 15 member states.

The new accord replaces a 1975 trade and cooperation agreement between Israel and what was then known as the Common Market.

Dealing with the Holocaust

CINCINNATI – An international symposium examining the experiences of Germany and America in dealing with Holocaust memory will take place in Cincinnati on March 31 to April 1.

The symposium will explore how should we remember and will we remember the Holocaust in Germany and America.

Fighting Anti-Semitism

MAMARONECK, N.Y. – After a series of anti-Semitic graffiti incidents stunned this suburb north of New York City, residents of varying faiths gathered to declare their solidarity in combating hate.

Martinique Shul Opens

PARIS – The 500-strong Jewish community on the Caribbean island of Martinique has obtained a synagogue, the first Jewish temple on the French island in 350 years.

The chief rabbi of France, Joseph Sitruk, and Jean Kahn, the secular leader of France's Jewish community, inaugurated Kenaf Aretz Synagogue last week in Fort-de-France, Martinique's capital.

Haftorah Commentary

NEW YORK – The first English-language Haftorah commentary – a work dealing with the weekly selections from the Prophets that have been read by Jews down through the ages – will be published in June by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, central body of 850 Reform synagogues throughout Canada and the United States.

TERROR IN ISRAEL

Redeployment On Hold

JERUSALEM – With the future of peace with the Palestinians thrown into question by a rash of closely spaced Hamas suicide bombings, Israel has imposed stringent security measures in an effort to stave off the wave of fundamentalist terror.

And in a departure from previous policy, Prime Minister Shimon Peres last week linked an Israeli redeployment in the West Bank town of Hebron scheduled for later this month to a demand that PLO officials revoke those portions of their charter that call for the destruction of Israel.

Coalition Considered

JERUSALEM – Political trial balloons were floated by the dozen last week, with suggestions ranging from the resignation of the government prior to the establishment of a short-term emergency cabinet, to the setting up of a "consultative forum" – with opposition representatives invited to join.

Cease Fire Offered

JERUSALEM – Izzadin Kassam, the armed wing of Hamas, last week issued a statement offering to suspend attacks against Jews until July.

The statement came several hours after Hamas leaders in Gaza gave a press conference demanding an end to the attacks "until a position can be developed for serving the interests of our people."

(The offer was subsequently withdrawn.)

Clinton's Pledge

WASHINGTON – Pledging to "step up the struggle for peace" and to "counter the threat of terror with unshakable resolve," President Bill Clinton joined Washington's Jewish community at a memorial service for the victims of recent terror bombings in Israel.

"Our faith may be shaken, but at times like this, it is all the more important to persevere," Clinton told an overflow crowd of about 500 people at the Israeli Embassy.

U.S. Anti-terror Bill

NEW YORK – Leaders of American Jewish organizations are calling for the immediate passage of anti-terrorism legislation that has languished for more than a year in Congress.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations made its call at a news conference convened to denounce the latest series of bombings in Israel.

Talks Suspended

WASHINGTON – Israel has indefinitely suspended peace talks with Syria in response to twin terrorist bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

At Israel's request, the United States canceled talks that were scheduled to resume March 4 at the Wye Plantation in Maryland. The parties met last week but reported no progress.

U.S. To Assist Israel

WASHINGTON – Israel has entered its war against Hamas with much more than American arms in its arsenal.

In the wake of last week's terrorist attacks, President Bill Clinton has authorized U.S. intelligence agencies to send long-sought sensitive information about Hamas activists to Israeli officials.

France Issues Rebuke

PARIS – France has canceled a visit by Iran's deputy foreign minister to protest Tehran's praise for the recent suicide bombings in Israel.

In addition to the cancellation of Mahmoud Vaezi's planned visit later this month, French officials summoned the ambassadors of Iran and Libya to "confirm our disapproval of the Iranian and Libyan reactions to the attacks carried out in Israel," a spokesperson said.

Community rally draws 1,500

Urgent appeal made to fight terrorism

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A ringing challenge to Yasser Arafat to "rip off his various masks" was issued March 7 at a solemn memorial to 57 victims of terrorist bombings in Israel, attended by 1,500 in the packed sanctuary at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

The challenge was issued by Rabbi Mark Dratch, as the Jewish community demonstrated its solidarity with Israel in its hour of pain and at the same time, broke into applause when Rabbi Dratch and Israel Consul General Jehudi Kinar said it was time for Arafat to curb the terrorists.

Full text of Rabbi Dratch's speech page 9

Both speakers urged Canadians not to cancel their trips to Israel because of the bombings, but instead to make long-planned trips now to show their strong links with Israel.

With fiery passion in his voice, Rabbi Dratch said Jews must observe the lesson of Purim, when Haman tried to spread disunity among Jews to weaken them. And he called eloquently for unity in the community. "This is not the time for political acrimony," he said.

"To the government of Canada, we say words are not enough. No terrorist should find a home in Canada. Support is flowing all too freely from North America to the terrorists."

The terrorists may enjoy some "short-term success," but they will never destroy Israel," Kinar said. They do know that killing a Jew in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv or Buenos Aires hurts all Jews, "but they should read the story of Esther and Haman. Hamas does not understand the resilience of the Jewish people."

Kinar drew a moving picture of the carnage at a Tel Aviv shopping mall on the eve of Purim when several children died. "How could these innocent children be the enemy of anyone?" he asked.

The mood of the dignified gathering was mirrored in Rabbi Dratch's address. "We say to the PLO: Now is the time for Arafat to rip off his various masks. Is he for peace ... or will he continue to offer whispered consolation to families of the likes of the 'Engineer'?

"The time is long past for ... changing those parts of the Palestinian Covenant calling for the destruction of Israel. The Palestinian people must show greater determination to control extremists. No more words, No more tokenism ... Only responsible action."

At another point, he challenged Hamas to reveal its true status. "Is it a social organization or is it a viper's nest of fanatics? It cannot be both, as it does in condoning terrorism and those who glorify suicide."

The reality of the shock to Jewish people everywhere and the need for action surfaced at Shaarei Shomayim time and again, even as grief was expressed in Hebrew Psalms by Rabbi Dow Marmur and when Cantor Paul Kowarsky recited K'El Maleh Rachamim, and in a poem Each Person Has a name, read in Hebrew and English by Candice Cooper, a young Toronto lawyer.

Kinar recalled how he was with the Canadian United Israel Appeal mission in Jerusalem when news of the first suicide bombing in Jerusalem reached them.

"The tenor of the room changed in a moment. That day I felt close contact with the Canadian community. We all felt as one."

The victims of the bombings included elderly Jews arising early in the morning to go to work to eke out their incomes, young recruits on their way to army training, children preparing for Purim and Russian immigrants on their way to make a bank loan, he said.

Who could not understand the 16-year-old army recruit who asked his mother to get off the No. 18 bus two blocks before it reached the central station, so he could appear independent? "But his mother, Chana, never saw him alive again."

The presence of Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick, Liberal M.P. Joseph Volpe, in whose riding the synagogue is located, and Bishop Terence Findley, head of the Toronto Anglican Diocese, was acknowledged by Moshe Ronen, chair, Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The commemorative assembly was sponsored by the Ontario region of CJC and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT), in conjunction with B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Zionist Federation and the United Israel Appeal of Canada. Sandra Brown, JFGT president, chaired the assembly.

Labor and Likud present their views

After the terrible events of the past weeks, my visit in Israel seems even further away than it already is. In the first emotional rush after the bombings, I questioned the relevance of continuing to share the notes of that visit.

But they are reminders that a mere six weeks ago optimism outweighed pessimism and cautious confidence was more prevalent than angry suspicion. The notes record statements and impressions from both public officials and private citizens which were valid at the time they were written. Readers will form their own conclusions as to their relevance in light of recent events. In this column, I will record the observations of the public officials who spoke to our group on the last full day of the conference, Feb.1.

Throughout the conference, organisers made sure that we heard from both sides of the mainstream political spectrum. Thus, two Labor and two Likud members of Knesset spoke to us. Deputy Foreign Minister Eli Dayan and Deputy Defence Minister Ori Orr represented Labor. Ze'ev Begin and Dan Meridor represented Likud.

Dayan addressed the topic After the Palestinian Elections. In his view, Yasser Arafat enjoys great support among the Palestinian people, support which has steadily increased over the past two years. Dayan believed this to be a good development for Israel, because it was evidence of growing support for the peace process among the Palestinian people in general. He had just returned from Gaza, where he saw tangible signs of an expanding, modern infrastructure being put into place, including new roads, houses, hospitals, and a modern port in Gaza City.

He stated openly that "Israel should assist in creating economic incentives for developing the Palestinian economy," for in his opinion, this would help to generate "greater interest among Palestinians to be at peace with Israel."

Of Yasser Arafat, he said that Israel has two pressing demands: He must change the Palestine National Covenant (PNC) and he must stiffen resistance against the Palestinian forces opposed to the peace process. In particular, he must destroy the infrastructure of the terrorist groups. Dayan concluded his remarks by stating that the government will not make any compromises about Jerusalem. Jerusalem will remain united and the sovereign capital of Israel.

Orr, besides being deputy defence minister in the government, is also a general (Res.) in the IDF. I suppose for that reason, illogically, I expected him to speak loudly and demonstratively. Thus, I found his mild, almost soft-spoken manner surprising. His message to us was delivered quickly, economically and matter-of-factly.

His years in the military have led him to understand that there are limits to the use of military power in achieving political results. In his view, the issue underlying the need for peace with the Palestinians is relatively cut and dried. Israel can no longer dominate – however benign that domination – two million people who do not wish to be dominated. The best way of moving the situation forward was through the step-by-step, confidence-building approach envisioned in the Oslo agreements. With good will on both sides, compromises could be found in security matters. But, in any event, Israel would not go back to the borders of the Six Day War.

Begin spoke assertively, in a loud voice, punctuating his energetic presentation with constant movements of his right hand. His topic was Negotiations with Syria. His thesis was that the notion of compromise, so deeply embedded in the western culture and way of life, was absent in the Middle East in general, and in Syria specifically. Thus, he was very skeptical about achieving peace with Syria. Syria's sense of national pride and national honor, he said, translates into a negotiating posture of "total intransigence." However, if peace with Syria is possible, it can only be based upon "total security for Israel."

Meridor, former minister of justice and present chair of the Likud party, spoke less energetically, but no less forcefully than did Begin. He provided The Opposition View of Making Peace. He urged us to avoid looking at the peace process within only a short range perspective, but rather to place it in a longer range context. To illustrate the wisdom in this, he pointed out that there have been three watershed events in the flow of Israel's recent history since 1970, all three of which converge into the present post-Oslo moment.

The first was the war by King Hussein against the PLO in "Black September" of 1970, as a result of which the PLO was expelled to Lebanon. The second was the trip by Anwar al-Sadat to Israel and the resultant peace treaty. The third was the Madrid Conference of 1991. Syria finally sat face-to-face with Israel, because it saw Israel growing stronger with every passing day. Israel must always be strong, he reminded us.

Meridor stated that peace is an important goal but it is not above all others. Peace, he said, must be accompanied by security and the fulfilment of Zionist goals. If brought to power as a result of the upcoming elections, the Likud would not abrogate the existing agreements with the Palestinians, but it would enforce them in a different, and he implied, better way. But he did not elaborate.

Cross-Canada vigils support women without gittin

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "How can an honor be given to somebody who is not an honorable person?" demanded an impassioned Joyce Eklove, chair of the Ontario region, Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, at Toronto's third annual Vigil for Agunot, one of several held country-wide.

About 70 people, many carrying placards, gathered in the lobby of the Bathurst Jewish Centre on the eve of the Fast of Esther to support chained women whose husbands won't give them a Jewish divorce.

Vigils, under the auspices of the coalition, were also held in Calgary, Edmonton, Halifax, and Winnipeg. Plans are under way in Ottawa and Vancouver to address the agunah issue as well. Montreal's vigil was postponed until March 19 because of a memorial for the victims of the Hamas bombings.

In Toronto, Eklove urged individuals and representatives of Jewish women's organizations to insist that their day schools, synagogues and other Jewish groups amend their bylaws to preclude any man who withholds a get (Jewish divorce) from holding a leadership position.

In fact, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has already amended its bylaws to that effect at the behest of Jewish Women's Federation (JWF), noted Jill Reitman, JWF's incoming president.

Reitman also mentioned the existence of Jewish prenuptial agreements to prevent a woman from becoming an agunah. They "should be mandatory for all couples," she said.

Telephone help lines for agunot have been established in Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal to offer confidential advice, said Sheva Medjuck at the vigil in Halifax.

Halifax, with limited funding, is establishing a post office box for women's inquiries about the get, added Medjuck, the Halifax area chair for the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get.

Although Canada's Divorce Act was amended in 1990 to ensure that divorcing spouses remove all barriers to religious remarriage of their spouse before a civil divorce is granted, there is still much to be done, she emphasized.

When a Jewish man refuses to give his wife a get, his wife cannot remarry in accordance with Jewish law.

Should she remarry under civil law without obtaining a Jewish divorce, any children of the subsequent marriage are considered to be born of an adulterous relationship and are therefore mamzerim under Jewish law. Mamzerim, while halachically Jewish, are forbidden to marry nearly all other Jews.

As long as men have mothers, sisters and daughters, the agunah problem is not just a women's issue, stressed Etty Danzig, chair of the Community Vigil for Agunot in Toronto and president of Na'amat Canada.

Although the majority of vigil attendees were women, there were a few men, among them David Elman and his son Michael.

"I came in the hope of a better, kinder Jewish world for my granddaughters," said Pearl Elman, David's wife. Holding a 9-month-old in her arms and with two little granddaughters playing nearby, she added that the agunah issue did not affect her family directly.

"You read about child abuse and everyone gets up in arms," said another woman, who came in support of a friend. "Why aren't there more Jewish women who care [about agunot]? It's very upsetting."

Rabbi Mark Dratch of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, speaking at the vigil for the second consecutive year, expressed his solidarity with the cause. "I am with you, as many other leaders are as well, in trying to deal with this problem.

"Perhaps we don't deal with it forcefully enough or agressively enough," he admitted.

"We must find a way to free the agunot so we won't need any more vigils," said Medjuck in Halifax. "Hopefully this is our last one."

Student delegates explain Israel to their teen peers

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A visit by two Israeli 16-year-olds to a Toronto high school last week was timely, given the recent spate of deadly suicide bombings in Israel.

"That's not what Israel's all about," Hadar Baharav told a Grade 12 World Religions class at Oakwood Collegiate Institute. "Israel has a lot of nice and neat stuff."

Baharav was one of about 76 Israeli teenagers to participate in this year's Israeli High School Delegation. The students, as part of a program sponsored by Israel's ministries of Education and Foreign Affairs, met with their peers in dozens of communities in Europe, the United States, Canada, South America, India, China, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa.

"We expect the Palestinian Authority to put an end to all the attacks," said Yaniv Belapolsky of Carmiel in northern Israel. "Terrorists walk freely with guns in the Autonomy. We expect the Palestinian Authority to catch them and put them in jail."

"Israel is taking a big risk with the peace process. We're giving a lot, and we want to get back our security," Baharav said.

The Israeli students, who also visited two Toronto private schools and met with Metro chairman Alan Tonks, showed the Oakwood teenagers a map of Israel superimposed on a map of Ontario. Israel's image was rotated to the right so that it stretched northeastward from Toronto to just past Ottawa.

"Oh my God, that's small," said one Oakwood student.

Baharav indicated the short distance from her home in Petach Tikvah to Tel Aviv, where a suicide bomber had struck the previous day outside Dizengoff Centre shopping mall. "You see how small Israel is. Imagine here [Petach Tikvah] to here [Tel Aviv]," she said.

In a year and a half, when they turn 18, both Israeli students will have to enter the army, Baharav told the class.

When a Toronto student asked, "Do you guys look forward to serving in the army? Is it a patriotic thing to do?" both visitors answered in the affirmative.

"And the guys in uniform look really good," added Baharav, with a twinkle in her eye.

Israelis don't serve in the army just to kill people, Belapolsky emphasized. "That's not the purpose. That's not my purpose." He hopes to become a doctor one day.

On a lighter note, the Israeli students talked about their high school subjects and extracurricular activities, passed around a 50-shekel bill for inspection and showed a video on Israel.

The students at Oakwood, who in the fall completed a unit on Judaism, were struck by how much like them the Israeli students were, said their teacher, John Scott, head of Oakwood's history department.

The purpose of the delegation is to establish a dialogue and foster better understanding between Israeli and Canadian youth, according to a news release from the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto.

By the time they return to Israel at the end of the month, Baharav and Belapolsky will also have visited Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. Two other pairs of students visited Canada — one in the Maritimes and the other in Montreal.

Fund to aid terror victims

TORONTO — A fund to support families of victims of terrorist attacks has been set up by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, in the wake of the series of deadly bombings in Israel.

The federation has begun collecting funds to provide assistance for those injured and the families of those who died in the attacks.

A flood of phone calls from Jewish community members wanting to help led to the fund's creation, said Avrum Rosensweig, assistant campaign director with United Jewish Appeal, the federation's primary fundraising arm.

"When we are so far away, people look for ways of being connected and of helping in whatever way they can," said Dr. Harry Krakowsky, co-chair of UJA's Community Cabinet.

Receiptable donations can be made by calling 416-631-5709, or can be mailed or delivered to Victim Support Fund, United Jewish Appeal, 4600 Bathurst Street, 5th Floor, North York, Ont. M2R 3V2.

'Kefiada' a cool experience for teens visiting Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What's a really cool way for a university student to spend the summer? If you ask some of the Canadians who went to Israel last year to work as day camp counsellors teaching English to Israeli children, they'll probably say, "Kefiada."

And you can take their answer literally, because the program derives its name from the Arabic word kef, which has worked its way into modern Hebrew vernacular as the equivalent of our "cool."

Kefiada, in English, might be called "a cool experience," according to Eli Rubenstein, director of young leadership development at United Israel Appeal of Canada, a co-sponsor of the program.

This year Kefiada is in full swing after a pilot project last summer. Co-sponsored in Israel by the Ministry of Education and the Israel Association of Community Centres, Kefiada offers students age 19 to 25 a unique and meaningful connection with Israelis at an affordable price.

In fact, the Ministry of Education is providing an airfare subsidy of about $600 (Cdn) to Diaspora participants, who are also given a small living stipend during their five-week stay.

Kefiada '96, which runs from June 19 to July 25, includes two weeks of training and three weeks of day camp activities at one of over 100 community centres throughout Israel. The Canadians — and other English-speaking Diaspora participants — work alongside Israeli junior counsellors with children age 11 to 14.

The ministry is investing a total of $1.25 million (US) into the program — a "new step in Israel-Diaspora relations," notes Rubenstein. "The people of Israel — through their government — is now funding Israel experiences for Diaspora youth."

Participants live with an Israeli family in the community in which they volunteer.

"My host family ... not only brought me into their home, but made me feel as though I were a member of their family. The community welcomed all the Canadian counsellors," said Sara Seaberg of Toronto, who participated last year.

"I've been to Israel many times, but this has been the most positive and personal experience of Israel yet," said Cammy Ulrich of Montreal.

Dry Bones

Apologia for Hamas

A mere five days after the bombing in Tel Aviv, the Globe and Mail, in its March 9 edition, published an article of almost 2,000 words by Paul Koring, entitled Dark truths in Gaza. The author purports to explore the living conditions of the people of Gaza because, as the headline writer wrote, "the recent suicide bombings turned the spotlight on the fact that two years after Yasser Arafat's triumphal return to a Palestine-to-be, life is far worse."

We hold no brief for Yasser Arafat. Life in Gaza is probably miserable for the majority who live there. But, as a journalist, Koring has an obligation to put the whole story before the reader to enable the reader to draw independent conclusions. Yet he simply never does this. Rather, he sweeps the reader into his own conclusions as he leads us to the predictable conclusion about the people's abiding loyalty to Hamas.

But as recently as March 1, Koring's account of the pulse of the people in Gaza was contradicted by Therya Rod-Larsen, the Norwegian emissary of the Secretary General of the United Nations in Gaza, who, in an open letter published in the Friday supplement of the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, wrote the following: "I have been living in Gaza more than a year and a half as the secretary general's emissary to Gaza. I have witnessed with my own eyes the changes, once unimaginable, in the opinion of the Palestinian people. Hundreds of thousands of Palestinians, who once fought and even struggled violently against Israel, now seek peace." (Translation by The CJN.)

More offensive, though, than Koring's selectivity in presenting the "facts," was his complete failure to explain to the reader exactly what and who Hamas actually is. He associates Hamas directly with terrorism only once in the entire piece.

Lest the reader forget, Hamas does not limit its aims to a confrontation with Israel alone. It sees itself as the spearhead of a mass movement fighting against the "warmongering Jews" and "world Zionism." Killing is redemptive. One reference from Article 7 of the Hamas charter should amply illustrate who they are: "The Last Hour would not come until the Muslims fight against the Jews and the Muslims would kill them, and until the Jews would hide themselves behind a stone or a tree, and stone or a tree would say: 'Muslim ... there is a Jew behind me; come and kill him.' "

The timing of its publication aside, the article is transparent advocacy on behalf of the Hamas murderers. It purports to give facts, yet it mostly gives opinions. It purports to tell the whole story, but it leaves much of it out.

Although it lacks the honesty and the integrity to say so, it plainly attempts to justify the murdering ways of Hamas. It is thus nothing more than an apologia for Hamas. Any fair and objective reading of the piece leads ineluctably to that conclusion. Indeed, the very last words of the article leave its purpose plainly ringing in the reader's ear: "We have to understand why these men would chose (sic) to die, not just seal their houses and imprison their families," says Hazam Sarraj."

The men who "chose to die," choose at that very same instant and in the very same act, to kill. They killed indiscriminantly, with a horrible and macabre cruelty that left the pieces of children's charred flesh to be scraped from sidewalks and building facades.

Far be it for this newspaper to suggest to the Globe and Mail or to any other newspaper what subjects are appropriate for coverage in their pages. The freedom we treasure for ourselves we also treasure for others. But a newspaper that claims for itself national stature must be held to appropriate journalistic standards. The piece by Koring falls far below those standards.

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

March 15, 1933 the Jewish General Hospital of Montreal was incorporated. It opened its doors the following year and was the first such hospital in Canada. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Canadian Muslim condemns bombings

I would like to strongly condemn the cowardly and heinous acts of terrorism aimed at innocent civilians in Israel. These acts of war against a fragile peace process cannot be allowed to continue.

As a Canadian Ismaili Muslim, I especially abhor the actions of organized terrorist groups who commit acts of violence in the name of Islam. There is nothing Islamic about killing another human being.

As a former member of Canada's Refugee Board, I have heard the painful cries of innocent victims of terrorism. I appreciate the pain of the family members of the victims and of the Jewish community everywhere.

Finally, on my own behalf and on behalf of my many Muslim brothers and sisters, I would like to add our voice to the collective Canadian voice in condemning the recent acts of terrorism in Israel. Muslims, Christians and Jews must not allow fanatics among us to highjack the peace process.

I pray that Allah gives the family members of the victims the courage to bear their pain — we all share their grief.

Peace is salvation for Israel

As North American Jews watch the recent Hamas bombings in Israel, it is increasingly difficult not to be emotional.

Notwithstanding the emotions we all feel, it is important to step backward and rationally examine how the latest destruction decreases the possibility that Israel's economy will become prosperous in the near future. While North American Jews have offered financial aid to Israel since its inception, our committed fundraising and charitable efforts will not offer stability to the Israeli economy. We must recognize that the only plausible manner in which Israel will receive stability is through peace.

This is the primary reason why we in the Canadian Jewish community must continue to support the peace negotiations. If there is any hope that Israel will create a stable and prosperous economy, that in turn could better the standard of living, it is through peace. As Jews we have suffered, and while retribution on Hamas is so very tempting, we must hold our heads high and recognize that our homeland will become economically stronger with the advent of peace.

Overcome the bar mitzvah syndrome

Most synagogues insist that boys and girls preparing for their bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies must go to Hebrew school to learn about Judaism, in addition to merely learning how to read out their Torah and Haftorah portion. Although this is laudable, it falls down in one critical aspect. Hebrew school can only reinforce what is taught in the home. If the parents know very little about Judaism and/or show little interest in anything over and above the bar/bat mitzvah party, this is the attitude the child will learn.

Perhaps the synagogues might want to consider setting up adult education classes in basic Judaism (for those who may not have gone to Hebrew school when they were younger) or lectures on Jewish ethics, for parents to see that Judaism is more than attending shul three times a year plus weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs. It would be doubly interesting to see if, similar to requiring the children to attend Hebrew school prior to the ceremony. the shul also insisted that the parents must also attend classes.

India wants Israel investments

India is the only country which has never persecuted Jews since their arrival after the Second Temple. Hindu Kings of Malabar, Kerala, have given them full religious freedom. Jews fought shoulder to shoulder with the Hindu army against Portuguese and other foreign invaders.

There are many similarities between Judaism and Indian (Hindu) social, religious and spiritual rituals, and customs. The Hebrew word for peacock comes from the South Indian Tamil language.

It is of interest that your two readers who recently travelled to India with Team Canada signed a contract for business worth $1.5 million. Today Israel stands second among top 10 foreign investors in India, but for some unknown reason, North American Jewish industrialists, except Seagrams of Montreal, do not show serious interest in investing in India.

Both Israel and India are facing the same external and internal problems.

Perspectives

Responding to Hamas

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

Words are embarrassingly inadequate. Terrorist bombs shock us into stunned silence, as the now all too familiar images of Jewish blood and flesh and limbs, of bodies brought to burial draped in the blue and white of Israeli flags, and of scorched skeletons of public buses become part of our collective memories.

We can only repeat the anguished cry of a young child heard on a Tel Aviv street on Purim, "Enough, enough, enough."

And we can but echo the lament of Esther read that night in the Megillah (8:6), "How can we endure to see the evil that has come to our people? How can we bear to see the misery and grief suffered by our people?"

But we cannot remain silent. We must speak. We feel an inner compulsion to give expression to our sadness and grief. We must give voice to our fear and frustration, our anger and anxiety, our confusion and consternation. However inadequate our words may be, we must respond, because in the past two years, 14 suicide attacks have claimed the lives of 135 victims; 57 in the past two weeks. How can we not respond to the heart-rending loss of women and men, boys and girls, mothers and fathers, sons, daughters and friends?

But how? As Israelis themselves grapple with these events and face the challenges of determining their future actions against terrorists, they too are frustrated. They are dazed by the burial of their dead. They are confused, not knowing what will successfully address their security and safety needs. All this and more, while engaged in deciding the political future of their country.

For us in Canada, lovers and supporters of Israel with deep historical, religious and personal ties to the country and her people — for us, too, the situation is frustrating. We share all of Israel's concerns, but observe only from a distance. Because we live on this side of the ocean, we are not directly involved in determining the political posture of Israel — and many argue that we have no moral right to do so.

How, then, do we respond?

To Hamas we say, no more! We shall rally all civilized nations to tolerate terrorism no more! How morbidly ironic! The name of this terrorist organization, an acronym for "Islamic Opposition Movement," means courage in Arabic. What does it take to send befuddled and brainwashed teenagers to take the lives of innocent civilians — courage? What does it take to orchestrate the latest outrage whose victims included children — 15-year-old Bat-Hen Shahak, who was in Tel Aviv with friends celebrating her birthday, and 13-year-old Kobi Zaharon, who was to have celebrated his bar mitzvah the following Shabbat?

Hamas — courage? Its meaning in Hebrew, "violence," is more correct!

To the PLO the world must say: This latest outrage occurred on the eve of Purim. Many of the victims were little children dressed in masks in celebration of the holiday. Their masks were ripped off even as their bodies were torn apart by those Arab heroes.

And now it is time for Arafat to rip off his various masks and say clearly and unambiguously where he stands. Will it be real peace with Israel, as he tells us, or a continuation of jihad, as he tells them? Will he use his efforts to engineer a genuine peace for Israelis and Palestinians, or will he continue to offer consolation to the families and students of the likes of the "Engineer"?

It is long overdue and the time is long past to expect responsible action from the Palestinian leadership by, once and for all, changing those parts of the Palestinian Covenant which call for the destruction of Israel. It is long overdue and the time is long past to expect them to live up to their responsibilities, to which they agreed when they signed the Oslo accords. And the Palestinian people must show greater willingness to protest terror and to curb and delegitimize, in serious and effective ways, their extremists. No more words! No more tokenism! No more empty consolations! No more expressions of sham sympathy! Only responsible and effective action!

To the government of Canada we say words are not enough! We are grateful for the words of condemnation and the encouragement offered to Israel. But we call upon our government to honor its pledge to join in the war against international terrorism in meaningful ways, by ensuring that no terrorist finds a home in Canada and by putting an end to financial support for terrorist organizations, support that flows all too freely and all too generously from North America.

And, if some will argue that Hamas is a social service organization that provides clinics and hospitals and financial support and education, we say that Hamas must determine whether it is a social service organization or a vipers' nest of armed fanatics. It cannot be both!

To our fellow Canadians, especially those of the Muslim and Arab communities, we say, make your voices heard — loud and strong and clear — condemning terrorism and condemning those who glorify suicide for terrorist means.

To Israel we offer words of heartfelt encouragement and fraternal consolation. We express our unwavering support and unequivocal solidarity with Israel and stand with you as you wage war against terrorism, "a war," as described by Prime Minister Shimon Peres, "in every sense of the word." We support you as you act to protect your safety and security. We pray that the shock of our pain will not be allowed to paralyze our minds and force Israel's leaders into wrong decisions. We encourage you, as we encourage ourselves, to face our fears with courage, and to calm our confusion with the certainty of our ultimate victory.

We Jews must show our unqualified support of the state and her people. We must show our confidence and trust by visiting Israel, especially at this difficult time. Israelis have no choice. They wake up every morning confronted by the possible threat of terror in their homes, on their buses and in their shops. The least we can do is not cancel or postpone our plans to visit the country. And if we have no immediate plans, then those of us who are able should certainly make them!

Hamas wages its attacks not just on Israel and the Peace Process, but against Jews as Jews and Judaism as Judaism. And so for every single young Muslim fanatic who blows himself up in the name of Allah for a free ticket to instant paradise by attacking our Torah and our people, we must encourage 100 young Jews to intensify their Judaism, their Jewish knowledge and commitment, and to be, not fanatics, but the guarantors of our future. Jewish continuity must be more than a slogan, it must be a reality!

Haman understood that we Jews are most vulnerable when we are divided. In describing the Jewish people, he said to King Achashverosh, "There is a people that is scattered and divided amongst the nations."

Not only were we mefuzar, scattered; Diaspora and exile are serious enough. More consequentially, we were also, mefurad, fragmented and fractionated. And it was this disunity and divisiveness that made us most vulnerable to Haman's nefarious plot. That is why on Purim we have the mitzvah of mishloach manot ish lera'ayhu, the obligation of sending gifts of food to friends. Our answer to mefurad is ish lera'ayhu. We must consider every Jew a dear friend.

Mordecai understood this lesson. He is introduced in the Megillah as ish Yehudi, ish Yemini.

Our sages ask why he is described as both a Yehudi, a Judean or a Jew, and Yemini from the tribe of Benjamin. I suggest it was because Mordecai knew that while he was a proud member of a particular tribe, it was no time for factionalism. Purim was a time to stand up as a Yehudi, a Jew, and to identify as a proud and loyal part of the whole. The crisis demanded a unified response and Mordecai haYehudi led the way.

We are all members of particular tribes, different religious groups and divergent political organizations. Our opinions have often divided us in the past. But this is not a time for politics of the past. We must realize what we stand to lose both here and in Israel if each of us does not identify and act respectfully as a member of the Jewish people as a whole.

If we identify only with a part of our people, we will be defeated. If we are only Orthodox Jews or Conservative Jews or Reform Jews, if we are only Labor or Likud, if we are only government or opposition, if we are only religious or secular, if we are unable to recognize the value inherent in the opinions with which we disagree and if we are unable to recognize the integrity of the people who hold those opinions, we will weaken ourselves; we will weaken our resolve; we will weaken our cause; and we certainly will not weaken our enemies. Each of us, all of us, must be ish Yehudi, a Jew above all else.

Of course we have a right to our opinions and positions and we have a moral duty to articulate them and pursue our causes to the best of our abilities. There may be significant principles that divide us. But we must never pursue our own positions in ways that may lead to wanton hatred and civil war, God forbid. Jewish unity is also an important principle, and respect for others, a supreme religious value.

We must learn the lesson of Mordecai and be, first and foremost, ish Yehudi. Whatever our "tribe," each of us is ish Yehudi. It is only by coming together, united on all fronts for the greater good of Israel and the Jewish people, that we can emerge from these troubling times with peace and security and with a brighter tomorrow for our people in Israel and for Jews everywhere.

And after all is said and done, we must turn to the God of Israel, whose Name is Shalom, in prayer, prayer for wisdom and guidance, prayer for consolation and hope, prayer for peace and redemption. As Isaiah prophesied, so we pray, (60:18): "Hamas, violence, shall no more be heard in our land, neither desolation nor destruction within our borders; but our walls we shall call Salvation, and Praise our gates."

What I meant was...

"So what exactly are you saying?" the exasperated caller asked me. "We spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on our institutions and it is getting harder and harder to raise that money. Should we be spending it on people who turn their backs on the community and marry out? We don't owe them anything. If anything, they owe us.

By Jean M. Gerber

I had another column in mind for this issue, but the above response to my last column made me change my mind. What had I been saying, after all? I admit that my position was unclear. But so is the community position. How much room is there in Jewish institutions for non-Jewish spouses and children? Some? None? Since that conversation, I have had to confront my own ambivalence.

I do not wish to embarrass individual Jewish organizations, as I may have done in my last article. But the question over what to do — when non-Jews show up at dances, or want to join sports teams or participate in campus-based activities, is not a theoretical one. It is a real one. Couples where one spouse is not Jewish want to join a synagogue. What is the answer?

I do not believe that by fencing ourselves in, we do our community a service.

I do not believe that our community dollars are wasted on outreach.

I do not believe that intermarried or interdating couples have turned their backs on the community.

I do not believe that if we only sit and wait, spend more on schools and camps, centres and synagogues, something will happen to turn things around for young couples deciding to marry without conversion. Not the building, but the people are the essence of Jewish experience.

Behind many assumptions about what to do with those precious community dollars, there is a fundamental misperception as to the shape of the Jewish community. Often we picture it as a series of concentric circles — a doughnut where the hole in the middle is the core of the community, the committed, the affiliated. The farther one is from that centre, the weaker one's affiliation and commitment, and the lesser the Jew. I utterly reject this picture.

Rather, our community is made up of many communities like an atom, dynamic, shifting, with people moving in a series of interlocking circles. Some move in more circles than others, some are on the outer edge at one time or another; but they move, they come closer, are attracted or repelled, never still, but always in potential touch with others around them. That is the community I am talking about.

Recently I spoke to a group of young people on the issue of Jewish identity. We talked about the ways in which each of us discovered our own attachment to Jewishness. I shared the experience of being a Jew by choice; they shared their individual reflections on when and how they began to realize their Jewish potential. Not one mentioned their synagogue, rabbi, bar or bat mitzvah as the vehicle or moment of insight. Family, community, chevrah, yes; but the Jewish religion and its associated institutions, no.

Figures in the last census indicate that for many Jews in Canada today, Jewishness has no religious connotation and therefore no hold on them when choosing a mate. There are, and will be, couples where one partner is Jewish.

And where will this couple go for their sense of belonging? I maintain that they want to go somewhere. Where in the Jewish community would they go to find that sense? Clearly not to a place where they feel shunned and rejected from the outset. Nor to a place where the philosophy is: "If you build it, people will come." (Baseball is not a metaphor for Jewish life.) They will go where they are accepted.

A former Vancouver colleague, Zac Kaye, director of Hillel Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, wrote in a recent CJN article: "Judaism has now to be brought to the people; it is not a part of the national environment." That is my point exactly. The natural environment is dominated by a secular approach to life. Judaism offers a great richness of history, culture and yes, religious values. But we need to get out of our chairs, out of our buildings, and tell people that it exists and that there is a place for them to begin to enjoy it and make it a part of their world view.

This is my last word on the subject. Next month, Passover. To all readers, a kosher and happy one.

Vienna finally to commemorate Herzl

The city of Vienna has always had a problem with its two major Jewish giants, Sigmund Freud and Theodor Herzl. Freud, of course, was hounded out of Austria's capital city by the Nazis in 1938 and died in London a short time later. Although the city does have a small Freud museum, it has never really celebrated Freud's connection with Vienna. The founder of psychoanalysis has been the proverbial prophet unrecognized in his own country.

By Arnold Ages

The same ambiguity informs Vienna's attitude towards the founder of modern political Zionism, Theodor Herzl. Much of Herzl's all too brief life took place in Vienna, where he worked as a journalist for a leading daily newspaper. It was in Vienna, moreover, that Herzl incubated the seminal ideas that were to burst upon the world in a book he published 100 years ago — The Jewish State. The city of Vienna, a late 19th century hotbed of anti-Semitism known, among other things, for having an openly anti-Semitic mayor, Karl Lueger, barely took note of Herzl or his ideas.

In the first decades after World War II, Vienna — and Austria in general — refused to acknowledge any special responsibility for its role in the Holocaust. In fact, Austrian spokespeople were fond of arguing that their country was the first to be victimized by the Nazis, when it was occupied in 1938. This reconstruction of history conveniently clouded the facts that a large number of Nazi functionaries were from Austria and that the majority of Austrians welcomed the German "occupiers."

Until recently, Austrian authorities adamantly refused to pay anything but token compensation for the loss of Jewish life, property and assets during the Nazi period. Some small accommodation on this issue has occurred in recent years.

In this context, it is refreshing to note that a century after the publication of the book which paved the way for the first Zionist Congress in Basel in 1897, Herzl is finally gaining a much more than honorable mention in his native city.

The city fathers of Vienna, in cooperation with the B'nai B'rith Zvi Peres Chajes Lodge of Vienna, have organized, under the patronage of Israeli, Viennese, American, English and United Nations institutions and individuals, a spectacular five-day series of events between March 17 and 21 to commemorate Herzl's contributions.

The idea for the international conference was suggested by Prof. Helmut Zilk of the Jewish Studies program at the University of Vienna and was immediately accepted, in order "to do justice to Herzl's epochal book and to his own historical importance."

In a brochure prepared for conference participants, Zilk comments that the city of Vienna wants to honor the memory of "this visionary genius, significant author and journalist, unwavering politician and statesman."

The Herzl centennial will feature more than a dozen political leaders, rabbis, priests and academics, who will give papers, not only on Herzl and his meaning for Jewish life and Zionism, but on contemporary political, social and religious issues.

The Archbishop of Vienna, Christopher Schoenborn, will give a presentation entitled What Does Eretz Israel Mean to Us? Conference organizers should be congratulated, moreover, for not hesitating to air controversial topics. Thus, a panel discussion will centre on the question of Austrian identity-Jewish identity, while Viennese author Robert Menasse will give a paper entitled Do I Have a Future in Austria Being a Jew?

Other topics to be covered by the symposium, whose participants include Shlomo Avineri of Tel Aviv University, Ludwig Erlich of Berne University and Dan Segre of Haifa University, include Herzl and Orthodoxy, Herzl and Reform Judaism, Messianic ideas in Herzl's vision, Zionism during the Nazi era and the Jewish contribution to European culture.

In addition to the addresses, the Herzl meeting will also feature literary and musical programs in conjunction with Vienna's Jewish Museum and other galleries. A conference, however well organized and attended, cannot, of course, erase the bitter memories associated with Jewish history in Austria, but small gestures such as this symposium can provide the building blocks to a renewed relationship between Austria and the Jewish people.

Has Arafat changed his spots?

From time to time, I am asked where I get my information about Israel. Certainly not from Newsweek or Time or the daily newspaper. I am a regular reader of the Jerusalem Report (liberal), the Jerusalem Post (middle to right wing), regular reports from the Israel Foreign Office (by way of Internet) and Arutz-Sheva (right wing, by way of Internet and otherwise).

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

When reading these various dispatches and analyses, I am not always sure I am reading about the same country — which is a good way of saying that Israel is a fascinating and multi-faceted nation.

I have been a longtime supporter of the peace process, but at the same time, I have harbored serious doubts about the political character and goals of Yasser Arafat. According to the Institute for Peace Education in Tel Aviv, Arafat's speeches during the recent election campaign were all but reassuring. In consequence, Brig.-Gen. Ya'acov Amidor admitted at a recent cabinet meeting that Arafat was not assimilating Palestinian society to the acceptance of a peace concept. On the contrary, he spoke of his commitment to the continued armed struggle against Israel. On several occasions he told his audience that the Palestinian struggle is divided into two stages: temporary accommodation and the eventual destruction of Israel (a program that stems back to 1974). Tellingly, the head of the Palestine Authority did not mention peace in any of his electioneering appearances.

At first, I wondered whether these reports were accurate, but then they were verified by a Norwegian newspaper, which reported on Arafat's Stockholm speech on Jan. 30, when he spoke before 40 Arab delegates at a festive dinner.

The peace process would result, he said, "in the complete elimination of the Zionist entity." He noted that the deep divisions within Israeli society, brought on by the Oslo peace process, would produce an Israeli civil war. Israeli Muslims would join the Palestinian cause and the struggle to produce one single united Arab state over all of Palestine-Israel.

Arafat added that Shimon Peres and Yossi Beilin are prepared to accept this eventuality as long as the religious privileges of Jews are respected. This, said Arafat, would prove unnecessary, since most of the Jews would emigrate to the United States, after Israel pulls back from the Golan Heights. Finally he added, "We Palestinians will take it all, including all of Jerusalem."

Obviously, Arafat appealed to the worst of old-fashioned Arab nationalism, judging it to be most efficacious for his purpose. Aside from that, the failure to amend the Palestinian covenant, as agreed in the Oslo agreements, presents a new and serious roadblock. All of which explains the basic mood of the Israeli public. People are both optimistic and afraid. There can be no question that peace means taking a chance, but in their view (so the latest polls indicate) this is better than continued warfare, uprisings and political instability.

The Kirshner File

They left footprints in time...

Jews have made a singular contribution to American culture, be it in film, television, theatre, ballet, literature or music.

By Sheldon Kirshner

In recent months, death has claimed the lives of a number of these figures, who have left footprints in time.

Florence Greenberg was a pop record producer of considerable importance. During the 1960s, when she was most influential, her independent labels, Tiara and Scepter, released an avalanche of hit songs, notably Dedicated to the One I Love, Tonight's the Night, Soldier Boy, Twist and Shout, Walk on By, I Met Him on a Sunday and Raindrops Keep Fallin' on My Head.

Among others, she worked with the Shirelles (whom she discovered), Dionne Warwick, Burt Bacharach, B.J. Thomas and the Isley Brothers.

Lou Levy, a former ballroom dancer, parlayed his company, the Leeds Music Group, into a powerful publisher of pop songs. Leeds Music published the first songs by Bob Dylan and Gordon Lightfoot and was instrumental in promoting the work of Charles Aznavour and Antonio Carlos Jobim to the United States.

In addition to nurturing the careers of artists like the Andrews Sisters, Connie Francis and Bobby Darin, Levy supplied Frank Sinatra with Strangers in the Night, the Everly Brothers with Let It Be Me and Tom Jones with It's Not Unusual.

Minna Lederman Daniel edited the magazine Modern Music and thus played a role in shaping American music. Modern Music, which was published from 1924 until it closed in 1946, carried articles by the likes of Leonard Bernstein, Alban Berg, Bela Bartok, Aaron Copland, Virgil Thomson and John Cage.

With the magazine's demise, Lederman Daniel applied her talents in related fields. She edited an anthology entitled Stravinsky and the Theatre, and she established the Archives of Modern Music in the Library of Congress in Washington.

Howard Taubman was a major force by virtue of his position as the New York Times' chief music critic and then as its chief theatre critic. He performed these duties in the 1950s and 1960s.

A graduate of Cornell University, Taubman joined the newspaper in 1929. He wrote or edited 11 books, including a biography of Arturo Toscanini and a guide on how to build a record library.

Henry Roth, the novelist, was best known for Call It Sleep, published in 1934 and rediscovered three decades later. Often described as a classic of American literature, the novel — a lyrical portrait of Jewish immigrants as viewed through the eyes of a boy — firmly established Roth as a serious writer.

After this success, Roth fell silent, succumbing to a massive writer's block. For the next 30 years, he labored in a series of menial jobs, first as a precision tool grinder and subsequently as a pulp and paper worker, a maple sugar collector, a mental hospital attendant and a duck breeder.

In the 1970s, he returned to his original craft, publishing A Star Shines Over Mt. Morris Park in 1994 and A Diving Rock on the Hudson in 1995, both of which were respectfully received. A posthumous novel, From Bondage, is scheduled to be issued this year.

Joseph Brodsky, winner of the 1987 Nobel Prize for literature, was widely regarded as Russia's poet laureate. Denounced by the Communist authorities as "anti-Soviet," Brodsky was condemned to a labor camp in the Arctic. Released before his five-year sentence was up, he returned to his home in Leningrad. Expelled from the country in 1972, he settled in the United States.

The son of a photographer, Brodsky taught at several universities and wrote a number of books of poetry, notably Less Than One and A Part of Speech.

Marcia Gluck Davenport was a best-selling novelist and biographer. Her biography, Mozart, has been in print since 1932, while her novels, Valley of Decision and East Side, West Side, were made into star-studded Hollywood films.

Jack Rose, a comedy writer, produced skits and one-liners for standup comedians Bob Hope and Milton Berle. Later, as a screenwriter and producer, Rose was involved in movies. He was associated with such films as Road to Rio (starring Bing Crosby, Bob Hope and Dorothy Lamour), April in Paris (with Doris Day and Ray Bolger) and A Touch of Class (which starred George Segal and Glenda Jackson).

Bob Barbash turned out scripts for some of the most beloved television programs between the 1960s and 1980s. His credits include Gunsmoke, Playhouse 90 and Starsky and Hutch.

Joseph Youngerman was an assistant director in more than 100 Hollywood films, ranging from Beau Geste and Sullivan's Travels to So Proudly We Hail and For Whom the Bells Toll. Beginning as an assistant prop man at Paramount studios, he later worked with some of the finest directors in the industry: Cecil B. DeMille, Ernst Lubitsch, William Wellman and Rouben Mamoullian.

Fred Fehl revolutionized theatrical photography by insisting on kinetic rather than traditional static photographs. In this way, he was able to capture the verve and vitality of performers.

A refugee from Nazi-controlled Vienna, he photographed almost 1,000 Broadway and Off-Broadway plays from 1940 until his retirement in 1970. His photos, which constitute a pictorial history of the American theatre, appeared in Life, Time, Look and Newsweek, and were anthologized in several coffee table volumes.

Paul Lipson was Tevye incarnate, the central character in Fiddler on the Roof, Broadway's longest-running show of its time. Lipson, who made his Broadway debut in Ben Hecht's Lily of the Valley in 1942, played Tevye more than 2,00 times, surpassing Zero Mostel in terms of longevity.

Lincoln Kirstein, together with George Balanchine, founded the New York City Ballet in the 1940s. The son of a department store executive, Kirstein — a Harvard alumnus — was a Renaissance Man. Apart from his interest in ballet, he was a novelist, a poet, a critic and an art collector.

Eugene Schwartz, an advertising copywriter, amassed one of the finest collections of contemporary art in the country. Over a 30-year period, he assembled a formidable collection of abstract works by artists of the calibre of Frank Stella, Donald Judd, Kenneth Nolan and Morris Louis.

Schwartz donated hundreds of canvases to museums and institutions, from the Museum of Modern Art to the New School for Social Research.

Shura Cherkassky was a great Romantic concert pianist whose repertoire — Chopin, Rachmaninoff, Mussorgsky and Liszt — held audiences around the world in awe. Born in Odessa but raised in the United States, he was praised for the sparkling freshness of his keyboard technique.

Lillian Fuchs, whom critic Harold Schonberg once described as "one of the best string players in America," was an outstanding violinist and violist. She gave master classes and two of her most illustrious pupils were Isaac Stern and Pinchas Zukerman.

Jewish Family and Child Service is offering a

Para-Chaplaincy Training Program

"BRINGING A SPARK OF JEWISH WARMTH"

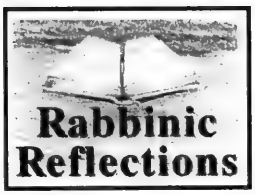
Chaplaincy Services is looking for a few very special individuals to deliver pastoral care to Jews isolated from the Jewish community.

After completing a comprehensive training program, para-chaplains will bring a needed spark of Jewish warmth to those they encounter. This course will develop the skills required to work effectively in chaplaincy. Communication skills, understanding the aging process, confidentiality, how to emphasize the Jewish identity of the patient/resident despite the locale and much more.

Training sessions will be held on eight consecutive weeks, beginning Monday, April 15, 1996. Limited enrolment.

Interested indivíduals should contact Rabbi Ronald Weiss, Director of Chaplaincy Services (416) 638-7800 ext. 217.

MAKE A DIFFERENCE -GIVE OF YOURSELF



All Jews must help support synagogues

By RABBI MOSHE STERN

"Rabbi, could you tell me whether after I receive an annulment of my marriage in the civil courts, I need to provide myself with a get." — "Rabbi, my father just died. Will you officiate at the funeral?" — "I've been on drugs, I can't stay at home anymore. I don't know what to do. Will you talk to me?" — "Rabbi, my son wants to get married next weekend. Are you available to perform a wedding ceremony?" — "Rabbi, I am having marital problems, what can I do?" — "Rabbi, my son is dating a gentile woman. Would you talk to him?"

In any given week, these are some of the questions and requests addressed to a rabbi. They may vary from these samples taken from my most recent week, but the implications will be the same.

Jews, young and old, have questions and problems. Jews, young and old, experience the crises of the life cycle and of these turbulent times. Jews, young and old, still turn regularly to the rabbi for an answer, for guidance and for service.

I had intended to write "to their rabbi." But this is precisely the rub. How many Jews in Toronto have a rabbi? How many Jews in Toronto have a relationship with a rabbi, so that they can turn to him and can call him by right? How many Jews in Toronto care enough to have a rabbi?

The majority do not. Year in, year out, they let others worry and work to keep congregations alive. They let others, a minority in Toronto, carry the responsibility. They are not interested in the living continuity of congregations and rabbis; let others bear that burden.

They want instant satisfaction. When they need a rabbi, there had better be one! When their rare moments come, then other Jews better have done their job well to provide a rabbi for them to turn to.

The institutions and their spiritual leaders can scrounge and squeeze, can merge or collapse, can flourish or die. They don't really care. But comes the moment of their need, of their trouble — then they pick up the phone and they expect, without a second thought, that there will be a number they can call, a congregation to which they can turn, so that they can buy a service from its rabbi.

To them, Judaism is a commodity and the rabbi is its salesman, its dispenser. They are consumers and they buy when they want and what they want. And just as with all the other goods they purchase in the marketplace, they expect someone to have taken the risk and trouble to have a stock on hand.

What a total misunderstanding of the best value of Jewish life! What a perversion this is! What a falsification of the role of the congregation and the rabbi!

Isn't it about time that those who sit on the sidelines and watch others labor and struggle to maintain congregations and their rabbis give them a hand? Isn't is about time for those sideline sitters to stop riding the backs of the concerned and devoted and join them in their efforts to make the synagogue survive?

Isn't it about time that all those many threadbare and spurious excuses for not being part of the congregation be discarded and Jews return to the fellowship of the synagogue — there to study, to pray, to learn from, and thus to be entitled to call on their rabbi?

Isn't it about time for all Jews to assume their responsibility for Jewish survival and strengthen one of the most important and one of the most effective of all Jewish institutions, the synagogue?

At this time of national tragedy and mourning, let us all come together and unite as a people, dedicate ourselves to Torah and strengthen each other with the eternal declaration of "Am Yisrael chai."

"Renaissance" now in vogue

By GOLDIE HERSHON
Special to The CJN

At the recently concluded 10th World Jewish Congress (WJC) Global Assembly in Jerusalem, over 1,200 delegates from 80 countries were introduced to a new term in the debate on today's Jewish condition: that word is "renaissance."

Guest Voices

It was used repeatedly by WJC president Edgar M. Bronfman and others, rather than "continuity," because as Bronfman put it, if we continue on our current path of assimilation and unaffiliation, we will face oblivion as Jews in the Diaspora.

The term "renaissance" can be defined as rebirth or renewal. But what I and many of my fellow delegates heard throughout the three-day conference were pleas for Torah study and Jewish education, Hebrew language, youth involvement and dedication to Israel. These are hardly new to Jewish life. What is being proposed is a traditional agenda for non-traditional times.

For some speakers, such as Israel's President Ezer Weizman, the only solution to assimilation is aliyah. For Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Jewish peoplehood is key, while Jerusalem's Mayor Ehud Olmert and Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu stressed Israel-Diaspora partnership.

Our Canadian Jewish Congress delegation, in a private meeting with Peres, urged him to provide leadership, not only within Israel but also to the Jewish people worldwide. Not that the burden of guiding Israel through one of its most critical periods is not onerous enough, but if we are to give meaning to his vision of Jewish peoplehood, then the role of the Jewish state and its leaders is absolutely vital.

A salient feature of WJC's Jerusalem assembly was a large student delegate representation from the World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS), Hillel and other youth organizations.

Certainly, new initiatives to engage and involve younger members in communal life are to be applauded, and the centrality of Israel in that exercise is indisputable. But even an Israel experience for young people is no universal panacea for disaffection and alienation. Without adequate preparation in school and at home, only a fraction of the youth participating in such programs are touched in a meaningful way.

The reconstruction or renaissance in Jewish life must not be confined solely to young people. Jewish education is essential, but if it means an abdication of parental responsibility for inculcating Jewish values, including tzedakah and involvement in communal affairs, then the results will be disappointing. That is true even if the ratio of attendance in Canadian Hebrew day schools is dramatically higher than in the United States.

If the message of renaissance is to be maximized, then elements of leadership from Israel and throughout the Jewish world teamed in a true partnership of equals, along with a restatement of the traditional goals of education and study, must be formulated.

However, such initiatives must transcend age criteria, organizational structure and narrow political and religious boundaries, and extend to all strata of our community. The basic building block of Jewish life throughout history, the family — and that means all its facets — must not be overlooked.

Reviews...in brief

Hilmar & Odette: Two Stories from the Nazi Era by Eric Koch, McLelland & Stewart $25.00

This astonishing memoir tells the story of the author's half sister, Odette, and his step-cousin, Hilmar, both born illegitimately in Germany before World War II, both half-Jewish and reared by "Aryan" families.

The author who left Nazi Germany in 1935 at age 15, is well-known as a prominent Canadian CBC radio, television producer and administrator.

Hilmar and Odette grew up as adults as the Nazis came to power. Hilmar, tragically, was denounced to the Gestapo by his adoptive mother and perished at Auschwitz. By contrast, Odette, never aware of her Jewish background, married a prominent German publisher and with spurious pretentions to royalty, entertained Nazi leaders in her Berlin salon and survived the war.

Compelling, ironic and compassionate, part detective story, part biography, this surprising account of two lives caught up in the web of Nazi madness is not soon forgotten.

God In All Worlds: An Anthology of Contemporary Spiritual Writing edited by Lucinda Vardy, Random House $45.00

This massive anthology of over 850 pages contains 500 selections culled from writings spanning the last 50 years that have shaped 20th century spiritual thinking. Major themes include quest, revelation, trials, surrender, death and awe. The selections achieve depth and meaning through the editor's insightful commentary.

The contributors to this work come from virtually every religious tradition. The Jews among them include Viktor Frankl, Albert Einstein, Martin Buber, Abraham Heschel, Allen Ginsberg, Judith Plaskow, Irving Layton and Abraham Maslow.

The editor, a resident of Toronto, has painstakingly compiled a book for serious and thoughtful readers who are concerned with "the quest for meaning."

Secrets Of The Jews by Stuart E. Rosenberg, Mosaic Press (paperbound)

Jews are the lone quintessential survivors of antiquity. Why? Larger and mightier peoples have perished. "But Jews," writes the author of this valuable work, "remain what they always were: a group possessing its own separate religion, language, historical consciousness and many other habits and customs that add up to what we call culture."

In this posthumous book, the author who served Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation as senior rabbi, reveals the "secrets" that kept Judaism alive and vibrant through the centuries.

This highly readable volume imparts a great deal of information in a popular and often entertaining manner. It is one more reason to lament the untimely passing of a gifted and outspoken community leader and scholar.

Israeli papers now on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

They have a practically unlimited potential circulation. Delivery is almost immediate. And you never get their newsprint on your fingers.

Electronic journals on the Internet present an incredible opportunity for magazines and newspapers to reach a new audience.

And Israeli newspapers and radio have already established an impressive presence on the Jewish Highway. Some of these sites are simply electronic versions of their printed product; others are unique to the Internet and have no counterpart in print. Some take a balanced point of view; others have a very definite editorial focus.

The Jerusalem Post [http://www.jpost.co.il/] maintains a large and timely site. Its Internet edition is updated on a daily basis and offers a generous selection of articles on such varied topics as news, opinion, sports, art, business and features.

The bi-weekly Jerusalem Report [http://www.enews.com/magazines/jr/] offers three feature articles from its current issue and from past issues.

In order to get a taste of what is happening in Israel, you shouldn't ignore the Hebrew press. The Israeli Foreign Ministry provides Israeline [http://gauss.technion.ac.il/israeline/], a daily survey of the Hebrew media translated into English. In addition, the Ministry also translates newspaper editorials and sports, weather and exchange rate reports [gopher://israel-info.gov.il/11/new].

If you prefer to listen to your news rather than read it, you can hear same-day newscasts from Kol Israel through the Internet at [http://www.artificia.com/html/news.cgi]. Your computer must be capable of producing sound (sound card, speakers etc.) and you must have a program which will be able to understand the file that you are downloading.

This site makes use of RealAudio technology so you will need to download the RealAudio program (free of charge) from [http://www2.realaudio.com/release/download.html]. Once you have all that installed, you will be able to listen to both Hebrew and English newscasts. The Hebrew bulletins usually last about five minutes while the English ones are much shorter.

If you still want to listen to Kol Israel the old-fashioned way through a short wave radio, you can get a copy of the current broadcast schedule at [http://www.globes.co.il/Features/Leisure/radio.html]. There you'll find times for English, French and Hebrew broadcasts and if you're so inclined, Yiddish, Ladino, Persian and other languages.

You've probably never heard of Ariga [http://www.ariga.com/gentoc.htm]. That's because this magazine doesn't exist on paper. Ariga (Hebrew for weave), is a small-scale Internet magazine created by Robert Rosenberg, who describes himself as a 20-year veteran journalist based in Israel. Ariga advocates "the free market place of idea" and religious pluralism. It's worth a look to see how the Internet is allowing new kinds of publications to flourish.

Arutz7 considers itself "Israel's Only Independent National Radio".

This radio station is headquartered on a ship outside of Israel's territorial waters — and Israeli government control. On its Internet site [http://www.jer1.co.il/media/arutz7/index.html], you can find transcripts of its news and editorial broadcasts which emphasize "positive, Torah oriented Zionism."

Several other newswires, newsletters and reports are located at [gopher://gopher.jer1.co.il:70/11/Politics/news].

Although these links are impressive, I'd think it's premature to cancel our subscriptions to conventional newspapers and magazines.

After all, you still can't wrap a fish with a computer terminal.

In a future column, I'd like to take a look at some Jewish Canadian organizations which maintain Internet sites. If you'd like to recommend a site, please e-mail its address to me at mdm@inforamp.net.

Jewish TV show set to air

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Jewish Magazine* hosts Ellie Tesher and Morley Torgov (seated) are joined by producers (from left) Howard Bernstein, Janice Maser and Stephen Gardner. [Barry Shainbaum Photo]

TORONTO — Although it hasn't aired yet, Jewish Magazine, Canada's newest entry in the television field, has already set lofty standards for itself.

It will be the first national Jewish TV show aired in Canada. The pilot will be broadcast on Vision TV (part of basic cable service), and if it is successful, the show will be part of Vision's regular lineup this fall.

The 30-minute show promises it will be like no other Jewish program. It will eschew the typical studio format and will be shot entirely on location, concentrating on one central event or theme each week.

And there's the talent: The hosts will be Toronto Star columnist Ellie Tesher and award-winning humorist and author Morley Torgov.

Producer Howard Bernstein, who has produced shows like Canada AM and The Journal, says Jewish Magazine's model will be the folksy but informative CBC Sunday Morning, known for its slow but steady pace and wry vignettes on life.

Jewish Magazine hopes to change the common view of a Jewish television show as a series of dry interviews with amateurish production values, Bernstein says, adding that it will try not to focus too much on Toronto and Montreal.

Each week, the program will feature a short documentary on a Canadian-Jewish issue, an interview, a disussion with a rabbi about the weekly parshah and possibly reviews and a cooking spot. Plans call for a pre-packaged segment from Israel.

Bernstein wants "to go heavy on the arts." For example, the show will be done on location from the annual Jewish Film Festival.

The program's pilot, Between a Rock and a Hard Place, will examine being Jewish in Quebec today. Special guest will be former Equality party leader Robert Libman.

One show was shot entirely at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital for a story on the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre.

Producer Janice Maser works the marketing/business end of things and has assembled an advisory board made up of leading community organizations.

A third producer, Stephen Gardner, will be in charge of technical and audiovisual details.

The program intends to be self-sustaining through advertising and sale to networks. Regular sponsors are being sought.

Meantime, plans for another Jewish TV show, The Jewish Journal, scheduled for broadcast on Rogers Cable, have been put on hold.

Vision TV is reported to reach eight million households. Jewish Magazine's pilot will air March 27 at 8:30 p.m. in Manitoba; 9:30 in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia; 10:30 in Alberta and the Maritimes and 11 in Newfoundland (all local times).

Negotiations are also underway to have the pilot broadcast over additional local, national and international networks.

Jewish directory reissued

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A second edition of a new directory of the Toronto Jewish community, Toronto's Original Jewish Pages, to be issued in May, will be double the size of the present one.

The directory, to come out twice a year, has had a good response according to Sarah Shefner-Doveh, who with her husband, Yves Shefner, are its publishers.

The two were publishers of the Hebrew biweekly newspaper Hamekomon and the English language monthly Jewish Life. Both newspapers suspended publication last August.

A total of 30,000 copies of the present edition of Jewish Pages have been printed, three-quarters of them to be distributed free at synagogues and Jewish centres, and the rest for sale at $3.95 at bookstores and other stores selling magazines.

Distribution began in January and another supply of free directories will be available in about a month, Shefner-Doveh said.

The next edition will have a special article on travel.

Mission 3000

Tragedy strengthens commitment to Israel

By Adi Waksman

Mission 3000, the largest to Israel in Canadian history, provided participants with an Israel experience far beyond their expectations. The United Israel Appeal/ United Jewish Appeal mega-mission, coinciding with Jerusalem's 3000th anniversary, became a lesson in courage and strength as much as a celebration of history, culture and religion.

On the sixth day of the mission, news spread of the fatal terrorist attack near Jerusalem's central bus station.

"We were on such a high when we got to Jerusalem and then early Sunday morning we heard the blast," remembers Bob Bercovici, who, along with his wife Bina, was dressing for breakfast when tragedy struck. "At first we were in shock and once we realized what had happened, I felt as if I had lost family."

Bob Bercovici and his wife Bina Feldman felt "at home" on the entire mission.

The Bercovicis were not alone in their grief, but even before the immediate shock wore off, the group stepped on to waiting buses for the long drive to Eilat. "We were told that all we could do was carry on," recalls Judi Morris, who was visiting Israel for the first time. "Our bus driver translated news reports and explained that what had happened was part of everyday life in Israel."

Morris says she would "go back in a minute" and has no reservations about sending her daughter Mindy on the Federation-supported March of the Living this spring. "If Jews in the Diaspora don't go to Israel we are letting down our brothers and sisters," she stresses.

The mission was Marlyne Lazer's third trip to Israel and definitely not her last. "I never felt frightened or insecure," Lazer confesses.

Sheila Rother, says she "didn't need to go on a mission to get turned on to Israel," but was pleased to greet new olim at Ben Gurion airport. "It was the highlight of my trip," explaines Rother who worked on UJA's Operation Exodus.

Herb Rosenfeld, who co-chaired Mission 3000 with Rosanne Ain, thinks missions are still the best way to educate people about Israel.

Sheila Rother assists an immigrant from Tashkent at Ben Gurion Airport.

"The tragic events that occurred demonstrate the amazing strength of the country and its incredible spirit," he says.

"The highs and lows were unbelievable," summarizes Bercovici. "I'd like to bottle the entire mission so that every Jew could experience what we did."

Judi Morris is ready to go back to Israel "in a minute."

Consul-general counsels participants on historic mission

It was not a role normally played by Israel's Consul General, Jehudi Kinar. But, when he joined Mission 3000 participants, the tragic events that unfolded demanded Kinar's skills as counsellor, advisor and friend, in addition to diplomat.

Consul General Jehudi Kinar felt a close contact between the community and the people of Israel.

During the mission, Kinar moved from bus to bus speaking with hundreds of participants, many of whom were first timers to Israel. "It was important to me to get to know as many of them as possible," explained Kinar, "and to see their surprised reactions to how advanced and powerful the country has become."

But what really impressed Kinar was how calm mission members remained when they learned of the bus bombing in Jerusalem on Sunday, February 25. When the news hit, many were eating breakfast in the hotel dining room before boarding buses to Eilat.

"The tenor of the mission changed within a minute," recalled Kinar, "but I told them that life must go on." And so it did. Kinar stressed to participants the importance of standing up to terrorism. "I was very impressed that nobody expressed a desire to leave and go back home."

Kinar, on the other hand, felt slightly torn. Should he return to Toronto to comfort the local community or remain with his fellow citizens and the Canadian mission? "I did feel the urge to go back," he admitted, "but I felt it was important for me to stay. I felt part of the group."

Community Matters

Each person has a name

Just four months after gathering to mourn the death of Yitzhak Rabin, Toronto's Jewish community came together again last week to remember victims of violence.

Over 2500 people joined a solemn Commemorative Assembly at Shaarei Shomayim synagogue for those who died in recent terrorist bombings.

As Jewish Student Federation speaker Candace Cooper (in photo top left), quoting Ukrainian poet Zelda Shneurson Mishkowsky, said "Each person has a name..."

The event was organized by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto in conjunction with B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Zionist Federation and United Israel Appeal of Canada.

From the heart of Israel...

The following is a letter written about the horror that gripped an entire nation after the terrorist attacks. Sari Bensimon, who made aliya two years ago, lives and works in Jerusalem. She sent this letter to her sister, Simone, who works for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

I cannot verbalize my feelings, nor can I accurately describe the scene for you. Suffice to say it is beyond the realm of anything near normal, or anything that a normal human being is capable of grasping. Yes, I was standing in that crowd last night. I went to pay my respects because I felt so helpless. I felt like lighting a candle was the most feeble attempt at showing my sympathy, but at the same time, it was about the only thing that I could do that was decent, barring private prayer.

Listen to these stories...Katamonim is the neighbourhood next to German Colony. The #18 (bus) comes from around the corner there. It is an extremely poor neighbourhood. You look from your balcony across to the other apartment and she's lost a son, and you've lost a neighbour, and the guy from the makolet (corner store) went to town on that bus because he was just going to buy paint...

Yoni Levy, an air force soldier, died yesterday. His sister-in-law went to his funeral after attending the burial of her nephew, another bus bombing victim... This school, called Beit Chinuch, has lost 4 kids from its senior class in the last 9 days. What does that do to the psyche of these kids? The family of another lady who died couldn't figure out why she didn't get off at her regular stop at the King David. I mean, they'll never know. I told you about the lady who suffered from shock the whole week after she realized she had missed the one that blew up last Sunday. She died this week.

Now I will give you stories from last Sunday. These will rip your heart out. The first is about the cutest girl, Merav. Her family lost another son about 8 years ago. She was on her way back to the army, starting a new position that day. She ran after the #14 but it sped away. So she got on the #18 instead... Another beautiful girl was engaged and planning her wedding for June. Now they are planning her funeral instead... And the two Americans? One of them was my colleague Joan's roommate. I took a call from her hysterical friend on the phone, SCREAMING at me to get Joan, that it was an emergency. Well, the emergency was that the U.S. embassy requested one of the roommates to come down and identify her body. She had been on the bus with her fiance. They were on their way to the bus station, on their way to Jordan for a little vacation... Today, someone at work tried to order in pasta but the guy on the phone said there was no delivery because their delivery boy was one of the dead on the bus.

I cannot tell you how interconnected this city is. It's frightening really. And graphic? I will not tell you about it. Tonight I heard a little 6 year old girl describe how she was in line for the bank machine with her aunt and she turned around and saw this man just standing there and then he just 'blew up' in front of her eyes. Yes, she's alive, but will she be normal after that? What do you think? I heard that people and things just FLEW everywhere...glass, metal, body parts, anything. Could I possibly enumerate the times I stood on that street corner in Tel Aviv waiting for my friends? I can't count. And all these people were doing was standing around with their kids on Purim - gone to Burger King for lunch with the kids and never came home. I CAN'T describe it, I just can't.

But I promised to end on a somewhat happier note if I could. My friend Andrea couldn't bring herself to go out tonight. Last night we were at the scene together and wow, you realize just who the people are that you love, and who love you. Life's just too short not to tell them.

I'm not working on Wednesday. I have Purim off. I think I will just rest, and if it's sunny I will go have a coffee downtown and maybe write another letter...

כמו ציפור:

בשנת 1974 חלחנתי את שירו של נתן יונתן "כמו ציפור", ושרו אותו "האחים והאחיות". באותו זמן הלחין גיון לנון את "כמו ציפור" שלו (Free like a bird) אבל הוא הסתפק בהכנת סקיצה על הטייפ הביתי שלו, ומעולם לא הגיע לביצוע מלא של השיר. אחר כך באה שנת 1980 הנוראה ומטורף גיון יורקי רצח את לנון. חמש עשרה שנה אחר-כך נכנסו שלושת החיפרשיות הנותרים לאולפן הקלטות והוסיפו את כליהם וקולותיהם לגיון לנון.מספר פול מקרתני: " החלטנו להתנהג כאילו גיון יצא לחופשה ארוכה ובקש מאיתנו להשלים את הקלטת השיר, וזה עזר להתגבר על העצב והמבוכה". אני שם את הקלטת על המכשיר והדמעות זולגות ללא משים. אני מרגיש בתוך חלום. אנימתגעגע לשנות הששים והשבעים שלא יחזרו. אני שמח על הסיכוי, על האור שטמון ביצירתיות, על החברות שהיא מעבר לזמן, מעבר למקום. הנס של קפיצת הדרך ממיס אותי. אז הינה לכם, במתנה ממני , שתי גירסאות של " כמו ציפור".

אדם - כמו ציפור,	כך, כמו ציפור,
כל עוד נפשו בו שר.	בתוך נפשי
בין שהוא בגפו, שָקר לו	לחרגיש חופשי.
בין שהוא מאושר,
יען כי חכל	מח קרה לאחבה,
מלבין עליו לאיטו,	שהיתה כל כך טובה
רק חשיר - אין לו כמישח.	וחיכן אותה קירבה?
	נעלמו חן לעינינו.
	ואיפה אותו מגע.
	הידידות והערגה?
	איך הרגשתי כמו ציפור
	כשהיינו שנינו.

שלום חבר - והתקליט:

מורים עצוב:

Jewish Russian Community Centre to mark 10th year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto (JRC) is planning a gala dinner March 31 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel to mark its 10th anniversary year.

The black-tie dinner, co-chaired by Dr. Lew Pliamm and Boris Bytensky, is a celebration of the growth of the centre since its inception in 1987. Funds raised will be used for JRC educational programs.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, spiritual leader and executive director of JRC, who was sent from New York in 1981 by the Lubavitcher Rebbe to work with Russian Jews in Toronto, says that when he arrived here there was no organized community. "There were about 1,600 Russians but there was no unity — no community.

"The first thing done was the publication of a Russian language newspaper, the Exodus, and after that a synagogue was established. A majority of the Russian community had never attended synagogue services and many of them had a sense that they should go. It was comforting for them to know there was a synagogue that welcomed them with open arms."

The community centre now provides a variety of educational, social and religious programs to the 30,000 Russian Jews living in Toronto. With such activities as Judaica classes, immigrant integration, Shabbat hospitality services, preschool and day care, Talmud Torah Hebrew School, teen programs, holiday programs and bar and bat mitzvah programs, as well as a fully functioning synagogue, the centre reaches out to Russian Jews of all ages.

"The JRC offers as much guidance as people want and fulfils their spiritual needs, whatever they are," says Rabbi Zaltzman.

Bytensky, 28, a lawyer, says that he and Pliamm, 29, both grew up in the Russian Jewish community and as "the younger generation we are devoted to fostering the growth of the community. The entire dinner committee has strong feelings about maintaining a strong identity.

"Even though the older generation has the strongest ties to the community, we are trying to bridge the gap and make young people feel comfortable about getting actively involved. The younger generation tends to be more integrated in the general community."

Rabbi Zaltzman says he is pleased that the dinner chairs are young people, because the centre needs young Jews to get involved in leadership roles.

"I hope that this is just the beginning of the involvement of the younger generation," he said.

Pliamm is overwhelmed by the response the dinner committee has received from the community. "It is encouraging that so many people reacted quickly and bought their tickets. This is the first black-tie gala event in our community and we've already presold over half of our goal. Even the entertainers surprised us with their response."

Planned entertainment at the dinner includes comedian Mark Breslin; Cantor Baruch Zaltzman; baroque jazz featuring Sergie Seredenko, Karisa and Ludmila Pashonova and Leonid Karpinsky; vocalist Michael Khinkis; and pianist Michael Ziskind.

Frank discussion expected on sexual decision-making

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Parents and teens will have the opportunity to participate in a frank discussion on sexual decision-making and the relevance of Jewish values, at the next program to be presented by the AIDS committee of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue at the synagogue March 26 at 7:30 p.m.

The discussion, to be led by Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, director of Camp Ramah, is the second of three programs presented this winter for various age groups and sectors in the community.

Rabbi Cohen, 36, who is currently developing a curriculum for teaching Jewish ethics to parents and teenagers, says that as a camp director, he is aware that sexuality is a critical factor in the minds of teenagers.

"If our role as educators is to make Judaism meaningful for teenagers, then it is essential to speak about issues that are critical to their lives," he said in a recent telephone interview.

There is a great lack of understanding about what Judaism has to say about sexuality, Rabbi Cohen said, and "since we live mostly in a Christian society, kids get the message that religion thinks negatively about sex. It is important to enlighten them and tell them that in the proper context, sexuality is a positive thing in Judaism. They need to know that Judaism has a positive outlook on life and is relevant to their life."

He stresses to parents, as well as other significant adults in teens' lives, the importance of keeping the lines of communication open.

"Kids are looking for guidance and if we provide it, then we have a chance of positively influencing their decision-making," he said.

His curriculum, he said, is not a formal one, but rather "a guideline for Jewish sexual ethics as I see it. What I am doing is taking a huge topic and bringing it down to manageable thought units.

"Discussed are specific things that Judaism has to say about sexuality and, by bringing in stories from the Talmud that parents can discuss with their teens, they are provided an entry to Jewish values.

"It is a very exciting area to be working in. I do not think that many adult education programs focus on sexuality. To be bringing up the topic at all is a critical first step," Rabbi Cohen said.

Manitoba premier 'overwhelmed' by JNF honor

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon says he had no idea when a delegation from the Jewish National Fund (JNF) booked an appointment with him that they were going to ask him to be the honoree at this year's Negev Dinner.

"I thought they were coming to see me about a new proposal for a project," he recalls. "I was overwhelmed by the honor."

Filmon will be the first honoree from outside Winnipeg's Jewish community. (In 1991, B'nai Brith Canada honored him with an Award of Merit.) The JNF is recognizing him for his staunch and ongoing support and encouragement of the Winnipeg Jewish community and the State of Israel.

Filmon has always had an affinity for Winnipeg's Jewish community because his background is similar to that of many in that community. The son of Romanian immigrants, he grew up in Winnipeg's heavily Jewish north end. His father, he says, spoke fluent Yiddish, a language he learned while growing up in Romania.

Filmon is also connected to the Jewish community because his aunt — his father's sister — married a Jew and converted.

"Gary Filmon is a familiar and popular figure at many Jewish functions," said Norman Vicker, Manitoba and Saskatchewan regional JNF president in a press release. "He has given generously of his time in support of local Jewish community and Israel-oriented organizations. The moral support he has extended to worthy Jewish causes and the sympathetic views he has expressed on dozens of public occasions have made him an outstanding candidate for Negev honors."

Filmon was first elected to the Manitoba Legislature in 1979. The civil engineer and former president of Success/Angus Commercial College became premier on May 9, 1988. During his administration, he worked with the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council in establishing a Holocaust Memorial on the Legislature grounds. His administration has increased funding for private schools. He has also been very supportive in the development of the Jewish Community Campus. He has been consistently supportive of the JNF and has never missed a Negev Dinner during his time as premier.

This year's 44th annual dinner will be held June 25 at the Winnipeg Convention Centre.

Calgary JCC faces financial crisis

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — A financial crisis faced by the Calgary Jewish Centre has led to an evaluation of all centre operations.

At a recent meeting of the board of the Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC), a true and rather grim picture of the centre's financial situation was presented.

The immediate problem is that the centre owes CJCC $170,000. This situation arose because, due to an accounting error, funds which were meant to be transferred to UJA from the centre's Visa and Mastercard accounts were instead directed to operating expenses.

For many years, CJCC has used the centre's VISA and Mastercard accounts to facilitate the payment of UJA pledges by credit card.

Because UJA has actively marketed the credit card option, in the past 24 months a significant number of people paid their pledges this way. The fact that the money was not transferred out was discovered when the time came to pay Calgary's obligation to UIA Canada, which administers money directed to Israel. The money was simply not in the UJA account.

As soon as the mistake was discovered, the executives of the CJCC and the Calgary Jewish Centre took steps to correct the problem. The centre's comptroller was fired and various committees were struck to assess the situation.

It was first determined that there was no evidence of bad faith or misappropriation of funds.

The use of UJA funds "should never have occurred and was not done with the knowledge of the board," said centre executive member Gerry Barron.

Measures have already been taken to separate centre and UJA accounts and to cut off the centre's ability to access UJA funds.

In addition, a committee headed by Marilyn Burke will begin to look at long-term solutions to the centre's ongoing financial difficulties.

In the meeting, it was revealed, that over the past few years, the centre's capital reserves have been tapped to meet operating shortfalls.

"Over the years, the costs went up and revenues did not match increasing costs — the centre was underfunded by $200,000. Now we've run out of money. There's nowhere to take from anymore," said centre vice-chair Aaron Dagan.

In addressing the immediate problem of replacing the UJA dollars, centre chair Beth Price told the Jewish Free Press that if the centre was to immediately reimburse council, it would have no funds to continue to operate.

The CJCC board approved a motion to put up assets of the CJCC capital fund as security to back a loan to the centre for a line of credit for up to $250,000. This will enable the centre to repay CJCC, and the Calgary community will meet its obligations to UIA Canada.

This also buys the centre time to take a cold hard look at its operations and come up with long-term solutions to ensure its continued viability.

"It's important to keep the centre operating and keep the problem at a reasonable level," said CJCC treasurer Morris Bleviss.

Faced with similar problems, other communities have allowed deficits to grow to disastrous proportions, Bleviss said. "We will address it early," he added.

The centre's current operating shortfalls are the result of inaccurate forecasting of revenues, explained Price and executive director Joel Miller.

A 30 percent decline in day-care enrolment is one of the most significant losses.

In addition, some of the other agencies within the community owe the centre money as payment for accounting services performed on their behalf and some memberships have not been paid.

Last March, the centre was forced to appeal to CJCC for an additional $80,000 over and above its $273,000 1994 UJA allocation.

Miller then instituted a program of cutbacks and staff restructuring. The accounting department, which serves both the centre and CJCC, was cut in half. Miller said this is one of the reasons the budget shortfall was not discovered earlier.

In 1995, the centre's UJA allocation was increased to $316,000. Over the past year, the centre has cut staff, brought in new people to revitalize programming and instituted fundraising efforts, but it has not been enough.

Oratorio highlights memorial

VICTORIA — A brief preview of A 20th Century Passion, an oratorio composed by Holocaust survivor Peter Gary, was a highlight of a Holocaust memorial meeting at the Jewish Community Centre of Victoria.

The oratorio, to be presented in Vancouver by the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra in June 1997, is a tribute to the life and death of the six million.

At the preview, slides of death camps were shown, with the solemn oratorio music in the background, and a commentary was given by the composer.

Gary, who lives in Victoria, has a PhD in musicology. He wrote 14 of the librettos in the oratorio; the others are by children who were in the Terezin camp.

The featured speaker at the memorial was Catholic author John Tomczak, who said that for years, he and thousands of others knew nothing about the horrors of the camps, because everything had been hushed up. He expressed indignation that the Canadian government had turned away Jewish refugees.

He said it is essential to let the general population know about the suffering of the Holocaust victims, and noted that survivors are not filled with hatred.

All they want is to have the truth told, in order to fight the lies of the Holocaust deniers. He said this is the responsibility of the entire Christian community.

The program opened with dramatic readings, given by a group of non-Jewish students from Victoria High School, of letters and notes by Holocaust survivors, many of whom live here.

A moment's silence was observed in memory of victims of recent bombings in Israel.

CONSULATE GENERAL OF ISRAEL

Record set for loan requests

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Board members of the local Hebrew Assistance Association addressed the congregations of several synagogues here on Shabbat Mishpatim, to describe the efforts of their society to help the needy.

The Torah portion read on that Shabbat relates to the prohibition of charging interest on loans to the needy. On that Shabbat, members of the North American Association of Hebrew Free Loans in all cities where the association has a local group explained the work of gemilut chassidism in their communities.

In a report reviewing 1995 activities, Mannie Druker, president of the local association, indicated that in the last five months, a record 55 loan applications were received, 35 of which were approved, with a loan value of $108,000. Currently there are 176 borrowers on the books with outstanding loans totalling $351,000.

In the past four months since the association celebrated its 80th anniversary, Drucker said 100 new members were signed up. As of September 1994 there were only 74 members in all. Membership, at a minimum of $25, pays for operating expenses.

"Our focus for 1996," Druker said, "is to make us better known among those in the community who qualify for and need our assistance."

The report says that a recent demographic study estimates that 18 percent of those in Lower Mainland communities are in financial need. "This translates to about 5,000 people."

Synagoguges taking part in Shabbat Mishpatim were Beth Israel, Temple Shalom, Congregation Har-El, Schara Tzedeck, Beth Hamidrash, Shaarey Tefilah, Or Shalom, Chabad-Lubavitch.

Jewish, Arab, Mennonite panelists discuss peace

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Panelists reporting on the recent Palestinian elections began their presentation with a joint statement which called on all peace loving people to condemn the most recent bombings in Israel.

"The extremists cannot be allowed to prevail," the statement said. "We look forward to a lasting peace in the region."

The panel discussion at the University of Winnipeg was co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU), the Canadian Arab Association and the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC). It was the third such event in the past two years organized by Anya Makow, the CFHU's executive director in Winnipeg

The programs bring together representatives of the Jewish, Palestinian and Mennonite communities in Winnipeg. This year's panel consisted of Jim Carr, a senior editor with the Winnipeg Free Press; Nabil Oudeh, an Israeli Arab from Haifa now living in Winnipeg; and Harold Dueck who was the MCC international development administrator on the West Bank from 1982-1987.

Carr and Oudeh, who is a conflict mediator, were in Israel in January to observe the Palestinian elections.

Elections

Both reported that the elections went off without a hitch. To an audience member who questioned the short campaign period, Oudeh noted that the recent election in Newfoundland came after just a three-week campaign (as compared to 16 days for the Palestinian elections).

Carr talked of how much the Middle East has changed in the last two years. While in Israel, he and Oudeh went to the Arab village of Deir Amar to visit the mukhtar, one of whose sons manages a Winnipeg Food Fare grocery store.

"We were received with the greatest warmth," he said. "It put a human face on the Palestinian people. They were enthusiastically looking forward to voting for a leader for the first time. They weren't fooled by candidates who promised the impossible."

On the Israeli side, Carr reported that the latest bombings have damaged Peres' standings in public opinion polls. The central issue in the coming Israeli elections, he said, will be negotiations with Syria over the Golan. The Labor party is prepared to leave the Golan, in return for a warm peace with Syria, which means trade and freedom of movement between the two countries. Likud doesn't trust Hafez al-Assad and views the Golan as too strategic an area to give up.

As to the final status of the Palestinians, he said there are many complex issues still to be resolved.

Carr's vision is of a peaceful Middle East with all borders open, a regionally integrated economy and improved living conditions for everyone.

Oudeh credits the intifadah and the Gulf War with spurring the current movement towards peace between Israelis and Palestinians. Israelis, he said, no longer saw themselves as invincible.

As well, he said, the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin by a Jewish extremist conclusively showed moderates on both sides that their real enemy is not each other, but the extremists in both camps.

The peace process is irreversible, he said, even if Likud should win the Israeli election. It was a Likud government, he noted, that gave back the Sinai.

"The question is how to create two sovereign nations in a very small space," observed Dueck, a businessman who has led several trade missions to Israel.

"There are many issues to settle. For example, how are the Palestinians going to ship the goods they produce? Will they have their own airport? How much land confiscated by Israel will be returned? How will the scarce water resources be divided?"

Practical steps we can take to encourage the development of a peaceful Palestinian state, he suggested, include lobbying the Canadian government to appoint a representative to the Palestinian community to demonstrate that the Palstinians are accepted in the community of nations. He also urged the Canadian government and other non-governmental organizations to encourage economic development among the Palestinians.

Purim celebration gives way to solemn memorial service

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A Purim celebration at Congregation Emanu-El developed into a memorial service for the victims of the bombings in Israel.

Rabbi Victor Reinstein said the usual festivities were held to a minimum, so that the children present would not be as disappointed as if they had been cancelled.

After the reading of the Megillah, Rabbi Reinstein asked the congregation, which included a number of non-Jews, to form a circle to pray for peace in Israel and to stand close together in an effort to give comfort to each other.

"We feel," he said, "that the entire peace process, which was won by the Israelis after so much effort and determination, will not be in vain. The people have given so much to bring peace so close."

After chanting the K'El Maleh Rachamim and Kaddish, Rabbi Reinstein asked the congregants to light candles and go outside in front of the shul for a short vigil.

"We honor Israel in its mighty effort to bring peace," he said. "Let us hope the yahrzeit candles we are holding will bring light to the world and that future Purims will be a time for joy."

David Kirk, a former University of Waterloo professor who lives here, handed out copies of a message he had received on March 4 via computer from Gerald Steinberg, a researcher at the Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar Ilan University in Ramat Gan.

In his message, Steinberg said, "The process has failed and details of which faction [of Arabs] is responsible for the kiling is not relevant when we are burying and mourning our dead. The first responsibility of the Israel government is to protect its citizens."

Steinberg said that on the political front in 1967, the threat of a combined Arab attack led to the creation of a national government and "this war requires no less."

He called for prompt military response by Israel.

The peace process which has divided Labor and Likud is no longer an issue, he said. "Only the skill and power of the IDF brought periods of relative peace. If this is the best we can hope for, it is better than what we have now."

Tribute to victims

VANCOUVER — A memorial service to show community solidarity with Israel was held on the afternoon of Purim in front of the Jewish Community Centre, to pay tribute to the victims of recent bombings in Israel.

Held under auspices of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, the memorial "paid tribute to the innocent victims of suicide bomber attacks during the last nine days," said a Federation release.

The program included a moment of silence, prayers and the reading of the names of known victims. Then K'El Maleh Rachamim and Kaddish were chanted.

The memorial was attended by many young people, who were urged to have faith in Israel and its ability to defend itself against the enemy, as it has done many times before.

Drop hate phone line 'Aryan of the Year' told

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Charles Scott, who last year was voted "Aryan of the Year" by the racist Aryan Nations, at a dinner in his honor in Hayden Lake, Idaho, has been ordered by the Canadian Human Rights Commission to get out of the hate phone line business.

Scott had been operating a hate line in Chilliwack, B.C., to recruit members to his group, called the Church of Christ in Israel.

The ruling by the three-member tribunal carries the weight of a court order and Scott could be found in contempt if he ignores it. Conviction would carry a one-year jail term and a $5,000 fine.

A hate line was closed down in Vancouver about three years ago by the Commission, and the order was upheld by the Federal Court of Canada. That ruling is under appeal but the phone line no longer operates.

In the recent ruling, the Human Rights Commission said that neither Scott nor anyone connected with him or his "church" can operate a phone service that issues hate messages.

The ruling followed a two-day hearing on a complaint made by the Chilliwack Anti-Racism Project Society. The panel heard several 10-minute taped messages available by calling a Chilliwack number that included Scott railing against Jews and non-white "mud people."

Scott was hounded out of Chilliwack last spring by residents who were upset at his activities, and the phone line closed down shortly after. Scott was also hounded out of Kelowna when he tried to set up another hot line, and he went to Ontario to look for a job. He now lives in Yahk, B.C., a few miles from the Aryan Nations compound in Hayden Lake.

Scott was convicted last November of trespassing and fined $100 for distributing pamphlets on the Canadian Forces base at Chilliwack. He still faces a mischief charge in Kelowna, as a result of a scuffle in August in which a TV camera was damaged.

Population boom expected in B.C.'s Lower Mainland

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — At the rate the Jewish community in this area is growing, the next decade will see at least another 6,000 Jews settle here, said Malcolm Weinstein, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV).

Speaking recently at the 10th annual general meeting, where he was re-elected president, Weinstein said the present Jewish population is about 25,000, but half of that number lived somewhere else 10 years ago when Federation was organized.

The community has diversified, he said. "Those of us who grew up in the Lower Mainland are outnumbered by those who did not. Those who used to view the Jewish community as existing primarily in Vancouver are no longer surprised to hear about growing and committed communities of Jews living in the Fraser Valley or in Whistler."

In a review of the past decade, Weinstein said that 10 years ago, the newly renovated and expanded Jewish Community Centre was "just a dream;" Or Shalom Synagogue was barely born; Beth Tikvah was "years away from its current strength and size;" Hillel House was old and unchanged from 30 years earlier; and Har El Synagogue on the North Shore "was far away from acquiring land for a new building. Few people knew what Burquest [in the Fraser Valley] meant or where it was."

Since 1956, the Federation has raised over $50 million for the local community and Israel, he said.

Weinstein urged the community to prepare for the next 10 years, "when some of us will be ready for senior housing and need an affordable place to live."

Jewish youth will marry, have children and look for a Jewish day school then a high school, he said, and steps must be taken "to ensure schools are still there to provide high quality Jewish education."

Plans must be made to provide the infrastructure and services for the expected inflow of newcomers, he said.

Federation "is in a unique position to promote a collective Jewish community consciousness. Federation can remind us to look up from our particular tree to focus on the overall forest, on what our community will look like and need in the future."

The JFGV, he added, must be a catalyst, reaching out to new populations, from young adults to seniors to the marginally affiliated.

Executive director Drew Staffenberg said 1995 was a year of change for the federation and that like every responsible business enterprise, "we must continue to evaluate ourselves and change to meet current needs."

He said that aside from fundraising, Federation aims to instil Jewish pride, Jewish involvement, Jewish inclusiveness and Jewish respect for all, regardless of the flavor of their Judaism. He said new partnerships have been built with Zionist organizations and with the synagogues.

Community campaign raised more than $4 million

Staffenberg praised the volunteers, "the backbone of our community and our organization."

The campaign report showed more than $4 million was raised in 1995, of which over $1 million was raised by the Women's Division.

A new feature of the campaign gave contributors the option of allocating 50 percent of their increase over the previous year to the agency or service of their choice. Vancouver was the only North American community to use this "plus giving" technique, Staffenberg said. It gives the donor "new choices in the way he or she can support the community."

Allocations for the past year included $1,267,329 for United Israel Appeal and $2,572,752 for local constituent agencies and programs. The National Budgeting Conference, which funds national and regional Canadian Jewish Congress, got $163,486; Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, $126,964; Council of Jewish Federations, $88,362.

Most of the local allocations went to schools, with Maimonides receiving $605,000; the Vancouver Academy, $487,465; and Talmud Torah, $450,000.

The Jewish Community Centre was allocated $410,000.

A new feature established by JFGV is joint purchasing of supplies by agencies and organizations, which is expected to save a considerable amount. Federation staff member Mitch Gilbert is coordinating this effort.

Also new is a Gift of Israel fund, a savings program for youth experiences in Israel. Funds are held in trust for youth and earn interest.

The Endowment Fund has grown to $4.2 million, which includes commitments in the form of long-term pledges, assignments of life insurance policies and bequests.

EVEN COURAGE HAS ITS LIMITS
An eight year old boy is bereft of both parents, killed within days of each other by Hamas suicide bombers.
The threat of occasional, indiscriminate violence from a sworn enemy is a fact of life in Israel. But when that danger is no longer sporadic and strikes with swift and deadly accuracy, when the enemy is determined to die for the promise of a quick ascent to paradise, the bravest may lose heart and the soul of a nation is at risk. The victims, their families and the People of Israel need skilled psychological help to cope with this madness. Na'amat has the right network to provide expert counselling throughout Israel, but more funds are necessary to meet this new challenge.
Please, translate your outrage into a positive act. A gift to Na'amat will help to heal and strengthen, and will ultimately affect Israel's future.

World leaders gather at anti-terror summit

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Leaders of more than 30 countries were expected to attend an anti-terror summit in the Egyptian resort of Sharm el-Sheik. But within days after the conference was hastily announced, conflicting views emerged over whether the event would be a high-level photo opportunity or a real chance to formulate international policy against terrorism.

Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres hailed the gathering as a major step toward international co-operation against terror.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who is co-chairing the summit along with U.S. President Bill Clinton, downplayed the anti-terror angle, saying that the international conference was called "to support the peace process."

The summit was called in the wake of a series of recent terror bombings in Israel carried out by the militant Islamic Hamas group.

After invitations to attend the summit were sent out over the weekend, Russian President Boris Yeltsin and French President Jacques Chirac said they would participate, as did Jordan's King Hussein and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Yemen, along with the Persian Gulf states of Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Oman and the United Arab Emirates, said they would send representatives to the summit.

It was unlikely that Syria would attend, and Lebanon turned down its invitation.

Iran, Libya and Iraq – all of which flatly reject the Middle East peace process – were not invited.

The 15-member states of the European Union (EU) were to be represented at the summit by Italian Prime Minister Lamberto Dini and by the president of the EU Executive Commission, Jacques Santer.

But other EU leaders were expected to attend, including German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, British Prime Minister John Major and Chirac.

The EU is also planning to send a three-member ministerial delegation to Libya and Iran to press these countries to openly condemn terrorism. If these countries refuse to do so, the EU will reconsider its relations with them, the group's 15 foreign ministers announced last Sunday, after a two-day meeting in Palermo, Italy.

In a statement issued after the meeting, they expressed the view that the Mideast peace process must continue.

"The European Union must clearly express its solidarity with Israel, its condemnation of terrorism and its continued support for the peace process," said Susanna Agnelli, the foreign minister of Italy, which is currently chairing the EU Council of Ministers.

Meanwhile, Hamas dismissed the meeting.

"The so-called anti-terrorism conference is a hostile international conspiracy to end our people's jihad and resistance," a leaflet distributed by the Hamas military wing said.

It added that the summit is a "desperate attempt to save the Zionists from humiliation and lift their cowardly spirits which were destroyed by our martyrs' courage."

In the leaflet, Hamas vowed to continue its attacks against Israel.

Israeli right jockeys for position

BY SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Likud representatives conferred with their Tsomet counterparts last Sunday, in order to assure them that Likud has no intention of subordinating their interests to those of Gesher.

The talks with David Levy's Gesher party also resumed Sunday, in an effort to finalize the agreement on fielding a three-headed ticket.

However, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu has already let it be known that he has no intention of giving in to what he sees as excessive demands on Levy's part regarding Levy's personal status.

Netanyahu assured Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan that his position will not be taken for granted, and will not be compromised as a result of Levy's demands. Doron Shmueli of Tsomet had warned that his party will back out of its deal with the Likud if Levy is given primacy over Eitan.

Both of Likud's new partners want to be recognized as Netanyahu's No. 2.

Levy also wanted a guarantee that Netanyahu will be the sole acting premier; that the clause allowing the prime minister to fire any of his ministers will not be employed against him; and that in addition he be given a senior portfolio and head a top ministerial committee.

Netanyahu is reportedly opposed to that, particularly because it directly injures Eitan's status.

Eitan argues that he had voluntarily ceded the second slot on the joint list to Levy but, though his name will appear in the third slot on the Knesset list, he wants recognition as Netanyahu's de-facto second-in-command.

Eitan notes that his party has a proven track record and won eight Knesset seats in 1992, while Levy's is an untried party with very poor prospects.

Netanyahu is reported to agree with this assessment. His improved position in the polls also allows him to play a tougher bargaining game with Levy, on whom Netanyahu grows less dependent as his prospects improve.

The Levy side, which earlier wanted to sign a deal, tried to minimize the disagreements. Levy dismissed them as "mere technicalities. Nothing more."

Arafat meets CIA officials

BY JERUSALEM POST STAFF
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat has met with a delegation of senior CIA officials in Gaza, in what was thought to be an unprecedented push for collaboration against Hamas terrorists, Palestinian sources said.

The hour-long, secretive meeting last Saturday with the CIA, at which Palestinian security leaders were also present, was held at Arafat's vacation home in Beit Hanoun near the Erez checkpoint.

However, officials close to Arafat refused to confirm or deny the meetings.

The American delegation was headed by deputy CIA director George Tenet, according to the sources who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The CIA told Arafat he had to arrest five key Izzadin Kassam figures believed to be behind the recent wave of suicide bomb attacks, the sources said.

They said Arafat presented the group with a list of security requests such as equipment, specially trained dogs, funds and expertise to discover explosives, as well as training in counterterrorism for the Palestinian police.

The New York Times reported last Saturday that the Americans were expected to press the Palestinians for information on Hamas, and to share technical expertise and data the CIA obtained from satellite photos and electronic eavesdropping.

U.S. officials were expected to press the Palestinian Authority, Jordan and Saudi Arabia to redouble efforts to block financial and political support for Hamas.

'We shall prevail'

[Cont'd. from page 1]

Of course, facts should not be covered up. But the media must evaluate its part in shaping the national will.

How are the results of the attacks presented? What is the journalistic value of pictures of profusely bleeding bodies or of a mother in tears at her son's grave? Do such photographs contribute to anything but demoralization?

Restraint, and consideration of the national interest, must walk hand in hand.

The media have a duty, at the very least, to avoid exaggeration and excessive repetitiveness. We have to find new ways to create national unity and a preparedness to face up to the dangers.

Too often, journalists ask interviewees whether or not they are frightened. The public must be aware of the realities in which it lives and of the fact that we have endured far more difficult periods in the past, and that in the future, we will yet face struggles and difficult periods, as long as the bitter hatred prompted by the Islamic fundamentalists continues to dominate our area.

This will be true no matter who leads the government.

To date, every government in Israel has had to face up to the struggle against Arab terrorism. It is safe to assume that in this respect there will be no major change in the future. The problem facing the nation today is not who will destroy the forces of terror; it is a question of who is capable of best leading the nation.

It is encouraging to note the responsible national approach of the opposition in supporting the prime minister in these difficult days.

For some 50 years, I have observed Shimon Peres in periods of crisis and seeming hopelessness. He was always capable of standing up to the most trying challenges calmly, sensibly and with courage in the most difficult and frustrating circumstances.

However, we must not deceive ourselves: There are no simple or easy solutions. As long as we are part of the Middle East with its pervasive presence of Islamic fundamentalism, we and other societies around us will have to struggle against terror.

No matter who leads the country, terrorism will continue. Under the conditions prevailing in the area today, it cannot be curbed as long as it is initiated and financed by Iran.

We have to struggle against terror relentlessly, with all the weapons at our disposal. But I do not see any purpose in stopping the peace process, which means returning to the intifadah, and perhaps worse.

We have to insist, as indeed the government is doing, that the Palestinian Authority fulfils its part of the agreement and takes an active part in wiping out terrorism.

I am convinced that this time too, we shall prevail.

Chaim Herzog was president of Israel from 1983-1993.

Acting against Hamas

[Cont'd. from page 1]

Victor said he was heartened by the Canadian response to the terrorist outrages. The participation of Chrétien and Axworthy at the international summit indicated the seriousness with which Canadian officials are treating the problem.

"Canada has taken a very active role on the international scene in countering terrorism," he said.

Referring to his meeting with Axworthy, Victor said the minister was "anguished" at the loss of life in Israel. He also "demonstrated a complete grasp of the complexities of the issue, the scope of the challenge facing the international community in eradicating the scourge of terrorism and the devastating toll these bombings have had on Israeli society and the peace process."

Victor said the CIC urged federal authorities to take steps to freeze the assets of any groups raising money for terrorists and to declare such funding illegal. Furthermore, organizations raising the money should have their charitable status revoked, he added.

The CIC also urged Axworthy "to make it clear to Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA) that Canada's financial support of the PA is dependent not just on denunciation but [on the] complete disarmament of Hamas and Islamic Jihad and the renunciation of the Palestinian Covenant calling for the destruction of Israel."

FUNERAL OF A LEADER

Hezbollah bomb kills one soldier, wounds nine

BY DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Staff Sgt. Erez David, 19, of Caesarea, was killed and five other soldiers wounded, one of them critically, in south Lebanon last Sunday.

The attack, in which four other soldiers were wounded, occurred less than 500 metres from the Fatmah border crossing point, near Metulla.

Hezbollah gunmen detonated a roadside bomb next to their patrol on the outskirts of Klia village, as they were travelling from Marjayoun to Metulla.

The device had apparently been planted in nearby olive groves, most probably with the collaboration of residents of the zone, even though those in Klia, a Shi'ite village, are considered to be friendly to Israel and the South Lebanese Army (SLA).

The route itself is used daily by hundreds of IDF troops and Lebanese civilians crossing into and out of Israel, including those from Klia, many of whom work in Israel.

The wounded soldiers were evacuated by helicopter to Haifa's Rambam Hospital. Deputy hospital director Dr. Zvi Ben-Ishai said one of the wounded was admitted in critical condition, while another was suffering from serious wounds.

He said the other two were suffering from light to moderate wounds, all of them as a result of shrapnel, and all of them had undergone surgery.

Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the attack, as well as for long-range mortar attacks in the Beaufort and Ali Tahr regions in the eastern sector of the zone that same day.

IDF and SLA gunners blasted suspected terrorist targets north of the zone in response to the attacks. There were no immediate reports of any casualties among the attackers or any civilians.

Gulf War ushered in era of negotiations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

The Gulf War ended five years ago last month, ushering in an era of nascent Arab-Israeli amity.

On Feb. 28, 1991, the United States, having driven Iraq out of Kuwait in a six-week war climaxed by a 100-hour ground offensive, declared a unilateral ceasefire. As this happened, the elements of an Arab-Israeli settlement fell into place.

Within eight months of Iraq's rout, the Madrid peace conference — co-sponsored by the United States and the former Soviet Union — took place.

The Madrid process was a great catalyst, spawning talks in Washington between Israel and its Arab neighbors, namely Jordan (which also represented the PLO), Syria and Lebanon.

Madrid, in turn, gave birth to the Oslo peace process, in which Israel negotiated directly with the PLO, and Jordan finally signed a long-awaited peace treaty with Israel.

Ironically enough, the crisis in the Persian Gulf, triggered by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, set the stage for a diplomatic resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

It was Saddam Hussein — the Iraqi strongman — who deliberately established a linkage between Kuwait, Israel and the Palestinians. In this respect, though indirectly, he played a pivotal role in pushing Israel and the Arabs to the negotiating table.

Hussein purposely created the link in order to justify his aggression against Kuwait (supposedly Iraq's 19th province) and to mute Arab criticism of his invasion.

Cynically portraying himself as a champion of the Arab cause, Hussein declared that the "restoration" of Kuwait to its Iraqi "motherland" was the first step toward the "liberation of Jerusalem."

Hussein was a charter member of the anti-Israel camp, having opposed the 1978 Camp David Accords and the 1979 Israel-Egypt peace treaty and, on the eve of his Kuwaiti adventure, having threatened to "burn half of Israel."

On Aug. 12, 1990, Hussein unveiled his first formal initiative for defusing the crisis in the Persian Gulf. It was in keeping with his objective of sowing confusion within Arab ranks and of trying to scuttle the U.S.-led anti-Iraqi coalition.

Linking Kuwait with the Palestinian question, Hussein proposed a comprehensive solution of all the problems besetting the Middle East. He called for an "immediate and unconditional" withdrawal of Israeli and Syrian forces from the territories and from Lebanon, respectively. Only then, he suggested, could there be "an arrangement" to sort out the mess in Kuwait.

On Sept. 30, Hussein launched his second diplomatic blitz to ease the growing allied pressure on Iraq. He invited France, long Iraq's closest ally in the West, to open a "debate" on salient Middle Eastern issues, notably Kuwait and Israel's occupation of the West Bank, Gaza Strip and Golan Heights.

On Oct. 9, following the shooting deaths of 19 Palestinians in East Jerusalem by Israeli police, Hussein was at it again. In a message, Hussein linked the killings to Kuwait, claiming that Israel had exploited the presence of U.S. troops in the region to heighten tensions with the Palestinians. Proceeding from this position, he demanded an Israeli evacuation of the territories and a departure of U.S. troops from Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States.

Hussein's transparent ploy blew up in his face.

Contrary to his wishes, much of the Arab world rallied behind Kuwait and remained loyal to the coalition ranged against Iraq. And Western leaders, from George Bush to François Mittrerand, resolutely rejected linkage.

However, as the crisis in the Persian Gulf deepened, the Western allies became increasingly receptive to the Arab consensus that an Iraqi pullout from Kuwait should be matched by a settlement of the Palestinians' grievances against Israel.

Once hostilities in the Persian Gulf commenced, Iraq made good on promises to fire Scud missiles at Israeli cities. Iraq hoped that the tactic would draw Israel into the war and thereby shatter the coalition.

Hussein's well-laid plan fizzled, and Iraq went down to ignominious defeat. But on Jan. 28, 1991, a full month before the Iraqi army was crushed, Bush pledged to take the lead in post-war efforts "to bring peace" to the Arab-Israeli arena.

On March 4, the U.S. secretary of state, James Baker, announced a two-track approach to dealing with the Arab-Israeli dispute. Two days later, Bush fleshed out the details, linking Israel's need for security with the "legitimate political rights" of the Palestinians.

In the same month, Baker embarked on the first of eight trips to the region to coax the combatants into peace negotiations. By October 1991, thanks in part to Saddam Hussein's self-serving rhetoric, the Madrid conference, with its vision of a new Middle East, had become a reality.

Bill seeks Orient House closure

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – The opposition in the Knesset succeeded last week in passing a first reading of a bill to close Orient House, the PLO's de facto headquarters in eastern Jerusalem.

Lawmakers approved the bill proposed by Likud Knesset member Yehoshua Matza, in a 49-36 vote. To become law, the bill has to be passed in second and third readings.

The Labor party was reportedly unable to muster a majority because members were busy with campaigns for approaching primaries.

In a related development, the foreign ministers of Germany and France reportedly decided not to visit Orient House during their trips to the region this week.

Orient House has often been the focus of Israeli-Palestinian tensions.

Attempts by Palestinian officials to hold meetings there with foreign leaders have been criticized by Israel, which wants to block Palestinian claims to Jerusalem as the future capital of a Palestinian state.

Last week Israeli police prevented Palestinian officials from meeting at Orient House.

Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal made the decision after receiving information that Faisal Husseini, the leading Palestinian official in Jerusalem, had invited Palestinian Authority officials to meet there.

After discussions between Husseini and Jerusalem Police Chief Aryeh Amit, journalists were allowed into Orient House, where Husseini read a prepared statement.

"We are condemning these explosions," he said, referring to the recent series of terror attacks.

Mandela to meet with Hamas

BY SUZANNE BELLIG
Jewish Telegraphic Ageny

JERUSALEM – Jewish communal leaders and leading South African politicians have reacted sharply to President Nelson Mandela's statement that he would meet with representatives of Hamas.

Members of the Islamic fundamentalist movement are said to be planning to attend a conference on the Middle East next month in Cape Town. The conclave is being held under the joint auspices of the Afro-Middle East Centre for Research and Information and the Centre for Contemporary Islam.

Mandela has condemned the recent series of terrorist bombings in Israel. But he said he would be willing to meet with the Hamas representatives.

"My attitude is to see everybody who wants to see me, whether I agree with his policy or not," Mandela said.

"It sometimes helps because I'm able to state my policy to them and to let them defend their own policy if they can."

Tony Leon, the leader of South Africa's Democratic Party, strongly disagreed.

"If the president believes that by meeting with Hamas he can change their views, he is sadly mistaken,'" Leon said.

Marlene Bethlehem, national chair of the South Africa Jewish Board of Deputies, and Joe Simon, chair of the South Africa Zionist Federation, called on "responsible politicians" not to meet with Hamas.

"We are angry that these people, whose hands are dripping with blood, intend visiting our country. Indeed, their terror deeds have been condemned by all – including our own government."

Perhaps the most poignant plea came from Robyn Lipner, whose grandmother, Sylvia Bernstein, 73, formerly of Johannesburg, and whose aunt, Gail Belkin, 48, formerly of Durban, were killed in the March 4 Tel Aviv bomb blast carried out by a Hamas terrorist.

"My family were innocent people. I believe it's absolutely disgusting and an insult that Hamas is coming to South Africa. I have tremendous respect for Nelson Mandela, but I don't think Hamas deserves to be met," she said.

A third former South African, Tali Gordon, 24, was also killed in the Tel Aviv blast.

Israeli Embassy spokesperson Ze'ev Luria said the government should kick out any Hamas member attempting to enter the country.

"The Hamas is a terrorist organization and all peace-loving states and leaders must join in the fight against this murderous movement," Luria said in a statement.

Beverly Hills Caterers and Le Parc: a superb kosher combination

As you are probably aware, in fall '95 Le Parc welcomed Raphy Amar as its exclusive kosher caterer and celebrated the opening of its permanent kosher kitchen.

Just how successful has the arrangement been? Successful enough that some six months later, Le Parc has already hosted a "staggering" number of affairs "of every conceivable type," says Raphy. "I expected we would be well received, but the response has surpassed my wildest expectations" he says. "It's as if we'd been here for years."

In a sense, of course, they have — with Le Parc's reputation already well-established as the facility in Toronto, and Raphy similarly renowned for his kosher catering expertise in Beverly Hills (California) and Toronto. Raphy is also the exclusive kosher caterer to both Adath Shalom and Shaar Shalom Congregations.

The master plan at Le Parc was not only to prepare superb glatt kosher cuisine under strict supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.), but also to make it affordable. Thus was born the $55/$65 promotion (detailed below), which has proven so popular that it has been held over to June 30/96.

Highlighting the month of January at Le Parc was the incredibly successful We are Having a Party, which brought together a wide variety of bridal exhibitors under Le Parc's spacious roof. Raphy's food stations stole the show. Of note were some 20 appetizers, delicious poached salmon, and the Montreal smoked meat station. The tricolour fusili with sundried tomatoes, pesto and pine nuts was to die for. Also in evidence was an exquisite sweet table decorated with the ice and watermelon sculptures featured previously in these pages.

Le Parc's weekday wedding advantage

Many important wedding decisions were made during that evening, and exhibitors and guests alike are already eagerly looking forward to next year's show.

One advantage of getting married at Le Parc during the week is that Raphy can guarantee you the availability of a separate room for your chuppah at no extra charge.

Weekdays or weekends, having your wedding at Le Parc is the perfect way to start married life. It's also the ideal destination for bar and bat mitzvahs, and for corporate functions, it can accommodate large numbers of people with unparalleled ease.

$55.00 PER PERSON / WEEKDAYS

$65.00 PER PERSON / WEEKENDS

This offer, valid to June 30/96, applies to functions of 125 guests or more. Taxes and gratuity are extra. Included are the following:

- Full Open Bar Including Wine
- Choice of 5 hot or cold hors d'oeuvres
- Choice of Pasta • Choice of Salad
- Choice of Chicken with Medley of Fresh Garden Vegetables and Potato or Rice
- Choice of Dessert

Deblins Linens: amazing savings for Passover and all year long

In Deblins Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd., the first thing you notice is color: pastels, primary colors and earth tones form lively contrasts with white and ivory. And if the brightness of the fabrics makes Deblins a delight to the eyes, the prices make it a pleasure for the pocketbook.

The Chitiz family, with decades of experience in the linen trade, operates Deblins on the principle of maximum quality, variety and service at minimum cost—or, to quote President Ellis Chitiz, "boutique quality at warehouse prices". This policy is successful; all three locations are always busy.

Deblins offers you quality merchandise for every room in your home. On the walls by the entrance, for example, are throw rugs with tapestry-like scenes on triple-woven 100% cotton. Moreover, all three stores—on Orfus Rd., in Thornhill and in Mississauga—carry the same merchandise at the same low prices. "If you find a better price elsewhere," Ellis urges, "buy it; but nine times out of ten, considering price, quality and service together, Deblins is the best."

Deblins' policy earns plenty of repeat business, even among those who comparison shop. Some customers compare prices as far away as Florida. Ellis challenges people to find better deals; he respects their ability to judge for themselves. All he asks is that they "compare apples with apples". Only when you look at identical products does a price difference mean anything.

You can buy all your dry goods and accessories at Deblins; the selection is huge. For example, there is a wide assortment of ready-made curtains, valances and draperies, chosen to complement sheet designs—and drapery hardware to match, including wrought-iron rods in different colors with a variety of finials.

Deblins has your Seder table needs well covered

Deblins also offers a wealth of table linens, whether for the Seder, Shabbos dinner or informal meals. They carry tablecloths up to 144" long; Visa no-iron, no-stain tablecloths come in ten sizes and 17 colors. Also, there are table rounds, table pads, napkins and napkin rings to dress up your table.

There are 18 bed settings on display at the Orfus Road store, each in a vignette with matching bathwear and accessories, in a variety of styles and price ranges—including a child's bunk with accessories in bright blue. Deblins' sheet selection includes Croscill, Wamsutta, Revman, Martex, Carrington, Springmaid and Fieldcrest; the Veratex, Crown Craft and Revelle lines, printed in Israel, come in ten different designs.

Pillow covers, duvets, duvet covers, shams and bed skirts are well represented. There are white Canadian goose-down duvets in all weights and sizes, including winter-weight duvets for your comfort in the cold months. There are five different duvet styles, nine pillow styles, and sheets for odd-sized length, width or depth of mattress.

The towel selection is just as impressive: Fieldcrest Royal Velvet in 24 solid colors as well as Jacquard and Spirella printed towels. Bathroom accessories include shower curtains, mats, soap dishes, tumblers, toothbrush and waste baskets, tissue and lotion dispensers.

Deblins ships all over the world, but offers boutique-style personal service. Questions are answered promptly and expertly, on everything from fabric care to color co-ordination. In the unlikely event you don't find exactly what you want, Deblins will order it, or custom-make it at a good price for you. "No problem" is a favorite expression here.

Deblins Superstore is a few minutes north of Lawrence, west off Dufferin; call (416) 782-2910. The other stores are in the Promenade Mall in Thornhill, (905) 709-0007; and the Mississauga Home and Design Centre at the corner of Winston Churchill and Dundas, (905) 820-1509. All three locations are open seven days a week.

IF YOU FIND A BETTER PRICE ANYWHERE ELSE,

BUY IT.

A lot of stores today offer a price guarantee. That means if you find a lower price anywhere else, they'll match it. So after running around to find a better price, all you're left with is the option to pay the same price somewhere else.

But isn't the best price what you're really looking for? Then shop at Deblins Linens. We don't match prices. Our goal is to offer you the lowest price in the first place. Sure, you might find an odd item at a lower price in another store, but don't come rushing back to Deblins to pay the same price. Just buy it. We're confident that when you compare both quality and price, nine times out of ten you'll get the better deal at Deblins ....not just the same deal.

The Bagel Wars Heat Up!

Bagel-lovers, prepare! The first area franchise of Montreal's phenomenally-successful R.E.A.L Bagel has just opened at 404 Steeles Avenue West, and we highly recommend that you drop by the store to try them. Made in the traditional European way — individually hand-rolled, boiled, then baked in a wood-burning oven — R.E.A.L Bagel's all-natural "secret" recipe produces a bagel that is crispier on the outside and chewier on the inside than its competitors. You will taste the difference!

Just about a year ago, Nora and Donnie Furman finally made the decision they had been contemplating for years — to leave Montreal and move here! The fact that they had been supplying their Toronto friends with R.E.A.L Bagels for years convinced them to obtain a franchise to introduce the product to Metro. They encouraged his brother Larry and wife Shari to join them in this venture, and both families moved to Thornhill late last year. Nora and Larry recently spent 4 weeks at the head office's "Bagel Training School" in Montreal learning all the tricks of the bagel trade.

But ... R.E.A.L Bagel is much more than what its name suggests. Not only does the store feature the signature bagels in more than 12 varieties, but the owners have decided to "import" several fabulous take-out items that ex-Montrealers know well, such as prepared foods from Moishe's Famous Steak House, genuine Montreal smoked meat, Summersweet patés, and the "to die for" cinnamon danish in the pan from Chomedey's incomparable 'Dirty Bakery'. They also carry a wide variety of deli meats and cheeses, including regular and "lite" cream cheese, breads and pastries, store-branded smoked salmon, assorted gourmet salads, Wildly Delicious preserves, vinegars and oils, and Green Mountain specialty coffees. Is your mouth starting to water yet?

Come visit the attractive, open-concept store where you can watch the bagels being made. Samples will be available at all times, as well as free coffee. For extra value, a R.E.A.L Bagel dozen is always 12 + 1! Be sure to take advantage of weekly specials. The store is open 7 days a week from 7 a.m. -11 p.m.

Is the Furman family concerned about entering the bagel wars? Not at all. The company's motto is: "If it's not from R.E.A.L Bagel, it's not a real bagel", so when you think about it, there's no contest!

What singles are asking for ... J.S.R. delivers

In a recent interview, Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto director Rob Singer, spoke enthusiastically, on what has become one of the fastest, easiest, and least threatening ways for Jewish singles to meet.

Q: What makes The Registry so unique?

A: For one thing, our concept is simple, fast, and fun. J.S.R. members get to select for themselves who they would like to go out with by reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles. These include photographs, providing members with a clear "picture" of what their potential partner is all about. Our members have the options of A) choosing for themselves who they would like to go out with B) accepting a date when they are chosen, or C) a combination of both.

Q: How much information is on the biography/profile?

A: The biographies are quite extensive, with the format consisting of a 2-page questionnaire, with members being asked to include specific information about themselves, as well as what they are looking for in a potential partner. Hobbies, interests, and community involvement are just a few of the many questions answered, while the photograph attached to each file enhances what has been read. This gives members a very detailed overview of the person.

Q: With all that information, how do you respect confidentiality?

A: In a service like the Registry confidentiality takes first priority. Each file contains the member's first name and a designated code number. No last name, address or phone number is ever shown, and a member's first name and phone number are only disclosed once both parties have agreed.

Q: How large is your membership?

A: We are fast approaching the 1,000 member mark in Toronto alone, and have an additional 250 files from our Montreal and Ottawa offices. What makes this number so special is that we are only 3½ years old. Word of mouth advertising and a high "success rate" have generated a record number of new members joining our service.

Q: How do you define "success rate"?

A: In today's society it has become increasingly difficult for Jewish singles to meet one another. The J.S.R. has been designed and implemented to alleviate this problem and has done so with phenomenal results. Our system has become one of the fastest and easiest ways for Jewish singles to meet. Members control how active they want their files to be. The concept is so successful that we are averaging an engagement every 7½ weeks.

Q: How does one contact the J.S.R.?

A: It's so simple. We are open 6 days a week, including evening hours and Sundays. If for any reason you cannot reach us in person, just leave us a message and we will return your call at your convenience. Our phone number is (416) 398-7068.

A Celebration of Stars

How wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. This is the perfect opportunity for anyone to accomplish all their party planning in one exciting evening.

"In just one show we have assembled over 40 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services, says show co-ordinator and party consultant Marla Kay.

The beautiful ballrooms of The Richmond Hill Country Club is the perfect setting not only for this show but for your next celebration. You will be able to sample the delicious offerings of Encore Food with Elegance and feast your eyes on the delectible food displays.

At 7:30 p.m., Ines Di Santo, owner/designer of Chez Moi will present her '96 collection on a fabulous runway fashion show featuring bridal, eveningwear and bat mitzvah creations. These will be accompanied by formal wear designs by Frances Fine Clothiers. The decorations and bouquets for the fashion show will be done by Evelyn Baker Floral Design and in addition, Air Magic will create some added excitement by displaying indoor pyrotechnic fireworks. The fantastic sounds of Cory Mandell Entertainment Group will provide electrifying music to bring the entire show together.

Liberty Silver and The Original Starsband, The Hourglass Orchestra, The Peppermills and The Magic Touch Orchestra will provide spectacular live entertainment to add to the ambience of the show.

When you attend The Celebration of Stars, your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. You have the luxury of making an instant decision based on what you have seen, heard or tasted or mull it over and decide at a later date. Many of the exhibitors will be offering show discounts and numerous give-aways. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs.

"People often have the misconception that planning a Wedding, Bar or Bat Mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay. "At The Celebration of Stars, you can choose from a variety of party professionals who strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. We are offering you bridal and party consultants, catering, clergy, invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, calligraphy, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, even alternative entertainment for your guests such as virtual reality and glass blowers."

Come and see for yourself that The Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss.

Admission and parking is free and there will be shuttle buses available from the Richmond Hill Golf Club when the Richmond Hill Country Club parking lot becomes full.

Please join us.

Family Narrowly Escapes Carbon Monoxide Poisoning From Faulty Furnace

March FURNACE EMERGENCY SAFETY UPDATE 1996

Amazing New Tune-Up Guarantees Your Furnace Won't Break Down ... Or This Service Is FREE!

No One Else In My Field Makes You This Bold Guarantee!

EAST YORK. Now you can have your furnace rejuvenated to "Factory Fresh" condition. And I guarantee it won't cost you a penny! In fact, you'll make a profit.

As you already know, your furnace gets dirty; out of alignment; less efficient; and wears out with age. What you probably don't know is that it wears out about twice as fast as it should!

In fact, most furnaces die in "middle age" and use 1/3 to 1/2 more fuel than they need to.

But I've created a fascinating solution to this problem that will make your home more comfortable, safe and save you a pot full of money ... with a special offer I hope you'll find irresistable.

FREE Electronic Carbon Monoxide Detector

Now, I know what you're thinking ... "What's the catch? Where's the gimmick? Are you completely nuts?"

But there's a method to my madness. I have two reasons for letting you get this much service.

First, my business is normally slow during March. And I decided that rather than lay off my top technicians, (and add to the unemployment statistics), I would strip out everything but my raw cost and keep my technicians busy.

Second, I'll actually make money on this in the long run anyway. Most people who sample my service like it so much they use me again at my normal prices (which, by the way, are great compared to my competition). So both of us win. You'll just win sooner than I will.

Anyway, doesn't it just make sense to get this service so your family doesn't have to live with the uncertainty of an unsafe furnace?

Risk Free Money-Back Guarantee

Get your furnace restored to "Factory Fresh" condition for only $99 and here's my guarantee to you:

Guarantee: If your furnace breaks down this winter and needs repairs for any reason, I'll refund your $99 ... no questions asked!

Since it can cost you thousands of dollars to replace your furnace; and since you have absolutely no risk; doesn't it just make sense to give my tune-up a try?

It's easy, just call Mary, my dispatcher, and she will schedule a "Champion Technician" to your home.

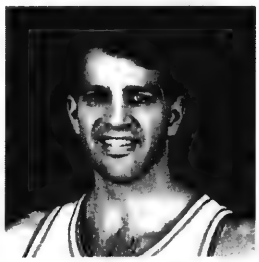
Schayes carries on family tradition in the NBA

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter



Dan Schayes

MIAMI — They say the apple doesn't fall far from the tree and in the case of hoopster Dan Schayes, that's meant a long and productive career in the NBA.

Last December, Schayes inked a one-year contract with the Miami Heat, extending his playing streak in the world's top basketball league to 15 years.

His father, the legendary Dolph Schayes, played with the Syracuse Nationals and Philadelphia 76ers from 1948-63, first in the National Basketball League (NBL) and then in the NBA. When he retired, the future Hall-of-Famer had racked up one NBA championship (1955) and had scored more points (19,249) than any other player up to that time.

Although he hasn't put up the numbers his father did, Schayes has scored 8,112 points, he's been in the league just as long and he's made himself a valuable player to a host of teams as he enters the twilight of his career.

In the last four years, he's played for the Milwaukee Bucks, Los Angeles Lakers, Phoenix Suns and now, the Heat. Prior to that, he spent seven-and-a-half years with Denver after starting his career with the Utah Jazz.

"I bring a positive influence from the knowlege-of-the-game standpoint and a positive influence in the dressing room," Schayes said recently following a grueling two-and-a-half hour practice under head coach Pat Riley.

On the court, Schayes, a six-foot-eleven, 276-lb. centre, fits in well with the Heat's emphasis on defence. He comes off the bench to "direct traffic," block shots and snag his share of rebounds. Playing in 25 of the Heat's first 59 games, he grabbed 27 offensive and 51 defensive rebounds (3.1 per game) while averaging only 14.4 minutes per outing.

Schayes told The CJN he'd like more playing time but he's happy with his decision to sign with Miami. After all, the weather is warm, he's fit in well with the team and there's lots of room for growth with an up and coming team. He's even survived the Heat's recent shakeup that saw the team add seven new players since December.

"He's a smart player who possesses good passing skills," coach Riley told a Miami publication. "He's a savvy player who has good court sense and knows how to play the game."

With his background, it's no surprise Schayes knows how to play the game.

"As young as I can remember, basketball was part of everyday life," Schayes said. Although his father never pushed him into the sport, basketball was all around him. In 1970, at age 11, Schayes was ball boy for the Buffalo Braves, which his father coached; in 1972, he attended his father's induction into the basketball Hall of Fame; for many years, his father's friends from the basketball world would drop by the house and talk about the game.

As a high school senior, Schayes helped a young U.S. team beat the favored Israelis, then European champs, in the finals of the 1977 Maccabiah Games. It took two free throws in the final three seconds to get the gold, he recalls.

In 1981, he captured his second Maccabiah gold. Both were great experiences, he said, adding he is currently a member of the U.S. Maccabi board of directors.

At Syracuse, Schayes studied chemistry and was named an Academic All-American.

After being drafted 13th overall by the Jazz in 1981, he joined the team as a centre who became known for being equally adept at long-range jumpers as short range layups.

Shayes is reputed to be the only Jew currently playing in the NBA, a far cry from his father's era when many toiled in the NBA and NBL.

In the 1930s and '40s, excellence in sports offered a way out of poverty for many Jews, he said. As Jews "became more affluent, sports became more of a hobby than a necessity."

Currently, the best prospect to carry on the Jewish tradition in the NBA is Doron Scheffer, an Israeli-born point guard with the University of Connecticut Huskies.

"I'm hanging on as long as I can," jokes Schayes.

Although he's 36 — the basketball equivalent of 65 in people years — Schayes believes he's still got a few more seasons left in him. But he and his wife Wendy Lucero, an Olympic springboard diver and broadcaster, have begun discussing life after the NBA. One of his options is to pursue TV commentary while another is to go into business with his father, he said.

Sailing aficionado makes business out of boating

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Remember the TV commercial of a few years ago in which an entrepreneur loved his electric razor so much he bought the company?

Well, Stephen Black is as enthusiastic about his boat business as that clean-shaven businessman was about his razor.

Years ago, he fell in love with the Hunter line of sailing yachts and in 1993, he and his brother Tevy got into the business, incorporating Jatis Yacht Sales and Services and obtaining the eastern Canada franchise for Hunters.

Eight of the Hunter family of boats were recently on display at the annual Toronto Indoor Boat Show — more than any other sailboat — and spectators could mount the yachts themselves for an up-close and personal look at the wind-driven vessels.

The Hunters are known for their large cockpit, roominess below, good ventilation and quality of construction, and for retaining their value over time, Black said.

Boats can range in price from $16,000 for a 19-footer to $265,000 for a roomy 42-foot centre cockpit sailboat.

The 33½-foot boat was the most popular in 1995, selling for between $117,000 and $120,000. The 29½-foot boat went for about $80,000. Six of each were sold last year.

For Stephen Black, the boat business is a line of work that's near and dear to his heart. He's been sailing since his bar mitzvah year back in the late 1950s.

"I took to sailing like a fish to water," Black recalls, while pointing out that his entire family are sailing enthusiasts. His 80-year-old mother, Ann, still spends each summer living on board her 40-foot boat at the mostly Jewish Island Yacht Club (IYC), he said.

As 13-year-olds, Stephen and his twin brother Ian joined the IYC's junior club and began sailing Nordbergs.

At 18 or so, Stephen became the head instructor for juniors and also participated in the club's Monday night regattas.

The exhiliration of competitive racing attracted him to the sport and during his many years on Lake Ontario, he's won numerous sailing trophies.

In 1986, Tevy bought a 37-foot Hunter "and fell in love with the boat."

Stephen later bought the same boat but removed the table and door, made it lighter, put on a spinnaker (the bulbous sail mounted at the front that allows the wind to push the boat forward) and raced it.

The brothers loved the Hunters so much they decided to approach the boat's manufacturers, the Hunter Marine Corp. of Alachua, Fla., for the dealership. The Americans, in turn, after examining the brothers' business background in property development, granted them the dealership.

Black said it wasn't just the love of sailing that got them into the business. "It's too much work to get into just for the love of boating. If you want to sail, you don't get into this business. It's incredible how much time it takes."

The sailing yacht business "is just like anything else. If the economy goes up, the business goes up. It's like any other luxury item."

Aficionados love the sailing lifestyle and even when times get tough, they keep their connection to the sport by "trading down."

Thieves strike at Yorkville gallery

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some 35 paintings and etchings valued at more than $150,000 were stolen from Gallery Louise Smith on Prince Arthur Ave. in Yorkville, early in the morning on Feb. 21.

Included are a series of eight important etchings by Jean Paul Riopelle, oil paintings by Arthur Shilling and Henri Masson and works by leading contemporary artists Leon Bellefleur, Genevieve Jost, Margaret Ludwig, Brian Marion, Paul Peregal and Noriko Suzuki. Both Ludwig and Peregal were recently profiled in The Canadian Jewish News.

"This is major," says gallery owner Smith, adding that the premises are equipped with sophisticated security. The police, she says, noting that robberies in the district are escalating drastically, have concluded that this is the work of professionals.

Proprietors of businesses in the neighborhood told Smith they had noticed a grey, '80s vintage Mercedes Benz circling the area earlier, but had not been particularly suspicious.

There was no damage to the gallery interior. Paintings and etchings were simply removed from every section and no very large works were taken. A 36 by 48-inch Bellefleur was left on the floor in the front room.

Jewish Museum in Manchester: Erected in 1874, the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in the once predominantly-Jewish Cheetham Hill Road district of Manchester closed down as a house of prayer in 1982. But thanks in part to a large donation from the Rothschild dynasty, the historic and architecturally attractive building was spared the wrecker's ball. Having been restored, it now serves as a museum.

Only the second Sephardi shul built in England (the first was the Bevis Marks Synagogue in London, erected 1701), Manchester's Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue was built by the families of a group of wealthy Sephardi cotton merchants who came here about 1850. (Manchester, as the centre of the world's cotton trade and the industrial revolution, was awash with mercantile opportunities throughout the 19th century.)

Inside, one finds a handsome temple decorated with a grand, circular stained-glass window, eight and a half feet in diameter, above the ark, and another eight stained-glass windows along the sides. As in many Sephardi shuls, there is a large balcony for women, the bimah is located in the centre of the hall with seats all around, and a multi-branched candelabra hangs from the ceiling. The building is a noteworthy example of Victorian architecture rendered in the Moorish style.

The museum is found upstairs, in the U-shaped space that was formerly the ladies' gallery. Utilizing historic artifacts and photographs, a display covers the history of the local Jewish community, which presently numbers roughly 35,000, from the arrival of the first Jews here about 1780. Appropriately enough, there is a picture of Nathan Meyer Rothschild, whose first home in England was in Manchester. He lived her from 1798 to 1805 and, like other savvy traders, opened a cotton factory and exported goods internationally.

Rothschild was the first of many Jewish traders in this city of northern England. As the museum documents, Jewish garment workers invented a once-popular method of rainproofing shirts and other clothes. It is no coincidence that the first Jews reached England's second city at precisely the moment the Industrial Revolution was gearing up. Other famous Jewish Mancunians include Chaim Weizmann and novelist Louis (Magnolia Street) Golding, whose papers are displayed.

Studio a popular attraction

The museum is open Monday to Thursday, 10:30 a.m. to 4 p.m., and Sunday 10:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Closed Jewish holidays. Adults, $5. 061-834-9879.

While in Manchester, don't miss the Granada Studios Tour, especially if you're a fan of British television productions such as Coronation Street or The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. Since opening in 1988, this has proven one of England's most popular attractions. Besides backstage tours and rides for the children, Granada features a life-sized, enclosed set of Baker Street, where the great fictional detective lived. At 221-B Baker St., there's a Museum of Criminology that features one of the largest collections of Sherlock Holmes and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle memorabilia anywhere.

Located next to Granada, the Manchester Museum of Science and Industry can easily take up the few hours remaining in your day. Manchester's eerily gothic Town Hall, the John Rylands Library, and the various walkable and picturesque town squares are also worth a visit. You may also wish to check out the lounge of the Midlands Crowne Plaza Hotel where, in the early years of this century, automotive history was made when Mr. Rolls met Mr. Royce.

British Airways flies daily from Toronto to Manchester, with connecting service via London Heathrow airport. For information on travel to Britain, contact the British Tourist Authority, 416-961-8124.

Eye on Arts

Theresa Tova Returns: I've written glowingly about Theresa Tova before. She's the charismatic singer-actress who performed a capacity concert, From Belz To Broadway, at Toronto's 450-seat New Yorker Theatre last January. She's appeared at various festivals and venues around town over the years, always astonishing and gratifying her Jewish and mixed audiences with her earthy, dramatic delivery of a medley of torch songs, Yiddish classics and show tunes.

"Everyone's saying she's better than Bette Midler," Hindy Nosek-Abelson says, with the exuberance one might expect from Tova's publicist. But Nosek-Abelson is also more. Like Tova, she was born in a displaced person camp in post-war Europe and, again like Tova, learned Yiddish right from the cradle. A freelance writer, Nosek-Abelson has helped Tova acquire a top-notch Yiddish repertoire by rendering the originals into singable, lyrical English translations; remaining loyal to moods and rhythms, if not always literal meanings.

"With a literal translation, a song is no longer singable, and it no longer has the stamp of the original author," Nosek-Abelson explains. "If it creates the same emotional response as the original, then you know you have a good translation."

On March 31 at 8 p.m., Tova gives a reprise concert, again entitled From Belz to Broadway, at The New Yorker Theatre, 651 Yonge St., Toronto. The return engagement is being presented by Tapestry Music Theatre as a benefit to support the development of Tova's Still The Night, a new work of musical theatre. Tova is planning to preview scenes from the new work at the concert.

Tickets to the show and a post-performance reception are $54; tax receipts for the maximum amount allowable will be issued. A limited number of general admission tickets are also available for $25. Call 416-537-6066 or 416-789-5100.

Spielberg Hires Toronto Lad: Larry Guterman, a former Torontonian who recently completed the master's program in film at the University of Southern California, was chosen personally by cinematic legend Steven Spielberg to direct a production for the much-touted Dreamworks Studio. With Guterman directing, filming has already begun for a CD-ROM video game based on One Day At Horrorland, R.L. Stine's thriller for young people.

Completed as part of his schooling, Guterman's masterful 35-minute film Headless! has turned the heads of industry bigwigs in Tinseltown. At 31, the former Hebrew day school student has already written an episode of the American TV show Tales From The Crypt and been hired as a scriptwriter for projects at Paramount and TriStar. As well, he is currently completing a second rewrite of a science-fiction screenplay.

Experts debate ethical dilemmas of managed care

By LESLIE KATZ
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

BURLINGAME – In an era of health care cutbacks, the Jewish community must help Jews pay those critical medical expenses not covered by insurers, said a prominent medical ethicist at the recent International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics in Burlingame.

"We will have to pick up the slack for what [health care providers] are not doing," Rabbi Moshe Tendler said.

In a lecture titled Rights and Obligations in Managed Care, Rabbi Tendler, a professor of biology and medical ethics at New York's Yeshiva University, said caring for the uninsured or underinsured is dictated by the Jewish principle of gemilut chesed, (acts of lovingkindness).

Opportunities to perform such acts will surely increase in the rapidly changing world of medical care, Rabbi Tendler said.

Many Americans have had to change doctors when their employers switch health care plans. Health maintenance organizations (HMOs) go out of business, leaving clients to seek new HMOs or other managed-care plans. Doctors also change their affiliations from plan to plan.

These factors affect the quality of the doctor-patient relationship.

But while the changing medical landscape has dramatically affected patients, physicians are also acutely familiar with the challenges of managed care. At the conference, physicians, health care workers, rabbis and medical ethicists discussed the way managed care affects the delivery of medical care.

With for-profit firms capturing more of the managed-care market, many of the doctors agreed they face greater difficulty upholding ethical standards in their work.

For example, where doctors once answered to their patients, they are now forced to answer to the companies who allocate funds for care. This represents a major conflict of interest, said Dr. Rita Charon, associate professor of clinical medicine at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York's Columbia University.

In attempting to increase profits, the companies will often pressure physicians to limit their clinical services. If a physician doesn't behave like a "good HMO doctor," Charon said, he or she may find his or her livelihood threatened.

"You're not just the agent of the patient," Charon told the audience, "You're an agent of the shareholder. It's your duty to increase the dividends of the shareholder. It's the good of the patient versus the good of the firm."

Rabbi Tendler went a step further, insisting there is no place in Jewish ethics for profit-motivated managed care. "The whole system is questionable," he said. "We don't need wholesale medical care."

He and others expressed concern that managed care – with its emphasis on the business of medicine – does not lend itself to compassionate medical treatment.

Some participants also questioned why doctors have generally failed to raise their voices to fight those aspects of managed care that they find objectionable.

"What the heck happened to the medical profession that they let this happen?" Rabbi Tendler asked.

Charon theorized that doctors prefer to downplay the financial aspects of their work, and have been ashamed to openly discuss the extent to which money and medicine are linked.

"Never before did doctors have to talk in public about their relationship to money," she said. "Up until now, we tried to make believe it didn't exist."

Another doctor suggested that managed care has polarized doctors, pitting primary care physicians against specialists, and making it difficult, he said, for them to band together to express common grievances.

Dr. Laurence Marton added another factor to the mix: physicians' fear of biting the hand that feeds them.

"There's great fear that they will lose something," said Marton, a former dean of the University of Wisconsin-Madison Medical School.

But while those at the conference voiced their objections to managed care, some did point out the aspects of managed care that can be beneficial. For one thing, Charon said, the restricted services offered by some managed care plans may ultimately lead people to clamor for universal health insurance for all.

The emphasis on preventative medicine encourages people to understand their bodies and take better care of themselves, which leads to improved general health, lower mortality rates and lower health care expenditures. And because primary care physicians are often patients' main source of medical guidance, they tend to know patients' situations extremely well.

Primary care physicians "get to know their patients' bodies, get to know the sources of meaning in their lives," Charon said. "That can lead to more comprehensive care."

Hospital gets new cardiac unit

NORTH YORK — The new Cardiac Catheterization Laboratory that recently opened at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre is expected to decrease the amount of time patients will wait for service.

With this second such laboratory, Sunnybrook has the capacity to perform approximately 750 additional diagnostic and interventional procedures in the first year. When fully operational, it will cut Sunnybrook's waiting time for elective catheterizations in half — from approximately 14 weeks to seven weeks, less for in-patients and emergency cases.

"North York General Hospital is a partner in the new catheterization lab, with Sunnybrook and the Ministry of Health," says Murray MacKenzie, president and CEO of North York General. "Working together and sharing clinical resources is essential when less money is available."

A combined total of close to 3,000 procedures can be performed in the two catheterization labs. This will include an estimated 2,200 coronary angiograms, up from 1,800; 450 angioplasties, up from 320; and 200 pacemaker implants.

Permanent pacemakers are usually inserted in an operating room, but the new Sunnybrook lab has been designed with a special sterile environment that has operating room capability to allow for the procedure.

Half of the approximately $2.6 million for the lab came from Sunnybrook and the balance was provided by the Ontario Ministry of Health and North York General.

Fighting hatred relatively new, says historian

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The law and the state have only recently conceived of having a role in preventing or constraining the dissemination of hate, said historian Phyllis Senese.

Speaking at a conference on Religious Conscience, the State and the Law, Senese, a professor at the University of Victoria (UVic), said it was the union of the Christian church and the Roman empire in the fourth century that made it possible for the state and the law to be used to implement and enforce Christian anti-Semitism. This was accomplished through the imposition of legal restrictions, including ghettos, specific clothing and badges of identification as Jews.

The law, she said, was not used to protect Jews, to prevent harassment or to limit or constrain hate directed against Jews.

However, once rights began to be extended to Christian dissenters in the 17th century, they were eventually extended to Jews. "But though they were legally emancipated, Jews found that in Western Europe, the United States and Canada, these rights were easily limited by administrative and procedural barriers to complete freedom," she said.

Using the law and the state to halt dissemination of hate is a recent decision by governments, she said.

Also speaking at the conference was Prof. Irwin Cotler of Montreal, who discussed The Protection of Religious Conscience in a Secularizing World.

Speakers at the conference came from universities in London, Montreal, California, Wales, Boston, Manitoba, Connecticut, Saskatchewan, Iowa, Toronto and Florida.

The event was sponsored by UVic Faculty of Law and the Centre for Studies in Religion and Society. The Centre "aims to foster dialogue between religion and the sciences, social and economic development," to build bridges of understanding between the various world religions.

Senese has done considerable research and writing on Jews of early Canada.

Survivor wants parents' names on memorial in Frankfurt

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 74-year-old Toronto man is anxious that the names of his parents, Jakob and Mina Grodtozinsky, whom he lost in the Holocaust, be inscribed in a memorial in Frankfurt, Germany.

To that end, Paul Gardner (he changed his name in 1948) asked Ronny Loewy, a film maker from Frankfurt, about plans for the memorial to be erected at the site of a destroyed Conservative synagogue which Gardner, an only son, and his parents attended. Loewy, speaking recently at a meeting in the Frankfurt-Toronto exchange series at Harborfront Studio Theatre, told Gardner he would take his request back to Frankfurt.

Though Gardner, who came to Canada with 600 other Jewish internees from England in 1940, has never returned to his birthplace in Frankfurt, he said he would consider doing so if his parents are properly memorialized.

An employee of Canada Post, even though he has passed the voluntary retirement age of 65, Gardner said he remembers Frankfurt as a city of 20,000 Jews before the war where his father represented a British textile manufacturer. This enabled young Paul to be sent to England by his parents who could not save their own lives.

Speaking under the auspices of the Goethe Institute of Toronto, the Jewish Film Society and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, Loewy said only five percent of the 7,000 Jews now living in Frankfurt are from Germany originally.

A lively discussion

Loewy himself is the son of German Jews who went to Israel after the war, where Loewy was born in Tel Aviv, and returned to Frankfurt 30 years ago, where they still live.

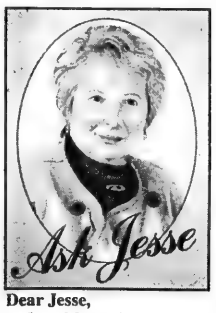
A 30-minute film about Auschwitz directed by Loewy, a staffer at the Fritz Bauer Institute, Frankfurt, his brother, Hanno, and Cily Kugelmann of the Frankfurt Jewish Museum, proved to be the focus of a lively discussion.

"There are still a lot of problems and not everything is right," Loewy acknowledged when asked by audience members why the Jewish death toll is not given adequate recognition at the Holocaust Museum.

"Remember there are only Polish curators there and they are putting up plaques in four languages, Polish, Hebrew, Yiddish and English. They're at the very beginning stage."

Recently archivists found 2,600 family photos belonging to people cremated at Auschwitz and the help of survivors is being sought to identify the scenes of life before the Holocaust, Loewy said.

Abraham's Gold, a film by Jorg Grader, dealing with a former Auschwitz guard who returns to the site 45 years later to unearth the gold he stole from victims, was also shown. The trip proves a disaster for the small town innkeeper when he is confronted by his daughter about his crime, and the friend who accompanies him discovers himself to be a Jew.



Dear Jesse,

Last May, with great difficulty, I placed my husband who suffers from Alzheimer's disease in a nursing home. I had taken care of him at home for three years; it eventually became impossible because he could not do anything for himself. It was a very hard decision because we had a wonderful marriage and my life is empty without him.

I visit him every day, but, during the last two weeks he really is not interested in seeing me. I could not believe that I saw him walking and holding hands with another patient. He puts his arm around her and although I know he does not realize what he's doing, it is very hurtful to me.

What should I do?

J. P.

Dear J. P.,

Your relationship must have been very special. Try to accept the reality of the changes caused by your husband's illness. The man in the hospital is not the same man who loved you and was such an integral part of your life. If you can acknowledge that perhaps your husband gets pleasure in holding someone's hand, it might give you comfort to know that he might feel less lonely.

Maybe the time has come for you to visit a little less often. You have the right to enjoy the hobbies and social activities that you missed while caregiving. This will also give you the opportunity to alleviate some of your loneliness.

There is information available from Alzheimer's societies and support from groups where you could meet with other spouses who may share some of your concerns. It is important for you to understand the illness.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

PASSOVER FARFEL AND FRUIT CANDY

1/2 cup dried apricots	1 cup matzoh farfel
1/2 cup unsweetened apple juice	12 dried pitted dates, halved
1/2 tsp. cinnamon	12 soft pitted prunes, halved
1/2 tsp. crushed coriander seed	1/2 cup firmly packed dark brown sugar
1/4 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg	1/2 cup shelled walnuts
1/4 tsp. crushed cloves	2 tblsp. honey

1) Put apricots in heavy-bottomed saucepan with apple juice and spices. Bring to simmer. Cover and cook 8 min. (most of liquid will have evaporated). Cool. 2) With steel blade in food processor, add farfel, dates, prunes, sugar and nuts. Coarse-chop in 10 on/off turns. Remove cover from processor and add honey and cooled apricots. Process until mixture forms chunky mass that holds together (do not puree to a paste). 3) Turn onto large sheet of wax paper and compress into 2" thick long log. Bring ends together to form 6" wreath. Transfer to flat plate; cover with plastic film and freeze until firm (3-4 hrs.). Bring to table and cut into 3/8" slices. Yield: 12 servings.

U.S. joins fight against terror

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – U.S. President Bill Clinton has pledged $100 million dollars to combat terrorism in the Middle East and to strengthen security ties with Israel.

Clinton made the pledge last Thursday at a joint news conference with Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

"The forces supporting peace and security are stronger than those that pursue destruction," Clinton said. "We must prove that. Whatever effort it takes, whatever time it takes, we must say to them, 'You will be tracked down. You will be rooted out.' "

The counterterrorism package is to include bomb detection scanners, robotics for handling suspicious objects and other hi-tech gear, U.S. officials said.

During his 22-hour visit to Israel after last Wednesday's international anti-terrorism summit in Egypt, Clinton repeatedly expressed sympathy with the victims of the recent wave of Islamic fundamentalist terror in Israel.

At the summit, international and regional leaders agreed to fight terror. A working group of foreign ministers is to meet in two weeks to discuss common issues.

Standing shoulder to shoulder and hand in hand, the leaders of 30 countries met last week in Sharm El Sheikh to discuss ways of fighting terrorism. After the summit meeting, U.S. President Clinton flew to Israel where he pledged his government's support to the people of Israel in their pusuit of peace and in the struggle against Hamas. [RNS photo]

Bouchard gets mixed reactions

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Reaction by Jewish guests at Premier Lucien Bouchard's address to the anglophone community varied from congratulations for his initiative and frankness to skepticism about his motives and despondency over his confirmation of yet another referendum.

Most agreed there was not enough news to change the mood in the community or ease Montreal's economic woes.

"It was what we expected, but not as much as we hoped," said FEDERATION CJA vice-president and businessman Stanley Plotnick. "It will have no impact. It's not going to convince anyone to keep their money here or young people to stay ... The malaise remains in the community."

Plotnick had hoped Bouchard would not stress the inevitability of another referendum.

"If there was any ambiguity that [he] is a separatist to the heart, it is now gone ... I'm disappointed that he did not, at least, announce a moratorium on referenda to allow the economy to recover, or offered some hope that Quebec might yet find satisfaction in a repositioned Canada."

Plotnick was satisfied that Bouchard appeared to distance himself from Jacques Parizeau's "ethnic vote" remarks. "I think we can put those racist comments behind us ... and now sit down and talk directly [with the PQ]."

Sheila Kussner, a volunteer and federal Liberal, did not derive even that much solace.

"That he would even think of another referendum at this time is shocking. To have this threat over our heads is a disaster for Montreal

Condo residents vs. Kalejs

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — During World War II, Imre Steinberger spent two years in a forced labor camp in his native Hungary before being confined to the Budapest ghetto.

Most of his family – his parents, grandparents, two brothers and their families – were murdered during the Holocaust and after the war, he found it difficult to return to a normal life in his native country. He could never be sure that the person sitting next to him on a streetcar was not responsible for killing his family, he says.

Seeking to escape that uncertainty, he moved to Canada where he'd be thousands of miles from the killers. Now, he is shocked to learn that the man he saw many times in the swimming pool of his North York condominium complex, the man with whom he exchanged small talk, is accused of the same sort of horrific crimes that claimed his family.

"My feeling is lost," he said in heavily-accented English. "It's a shock to me."

Steinberger, who now goes by the name Jack Smith, was one of about 55 residents of an elegant North York condominium building, who gathered last week to express their

Wallenberg Memorial

TORONTO – Metropolitan Toronto Council recently approved a donation towards a memorial to Raoul Wallenberg in Earl Bales Park.

Renowned artist Ernest Raab has designed this memorial which will consist of a bronze bust of Wallenberg atop a granite pedestal.

The project is scheduled to be unveiled and dedicated during the summer of 1996. The estimated cost is $50,000.

Federation Goes On-Line

TORONTO — The Jewish Toronto web site was recently launched.

Jewish Toronto, sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, includes a community events calendar, a "youth lounge," the most recent community news, community services, Jewish arts and entertainment information, a variety of Federation publications and links to other sites.

The web site's address is http://www.feduja.org

JF&CS Accredited

TORONTO – Jewish Family and Child Service has received a certificate of accreditation from the Council on Accreditation of Services for Families and Children.

Accreditation attests that an agency has met a set of nationally established requirements which help ensure quality service.

ISRAEL

Blockade Eased

JERUSALEM – Amid reports of dwindling food supplies and acute medical emergencies, an Israeli cabinet member said the government had no choice but to ease the closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"At some point, we will be forced to ease the closure," Finance Minister Avraham Shochat said last week. "We do not want to starve the residents" of the West Bank and Gaza.

Israel, U.S. Defence Pact

JERUSALEM – Israel and the United States are moving closer toward forging a strategic defence pact.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres has instructed officials from the Foreign and Defence ministries to bring up the topic during their discussions with Clinton administration officials.

Negev Development

BEERSHEVA – A major conference on economic development of the Negev will be held at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Beersheva in March.

The conference will focus on the economic development of the Negev in the light of the changing political situation.

WORLD

Curbing Hamas Funds

LONDON – The British government has taken steps to curb the transfer of funds to Hamas, the militant Islamic movement that claimed responsibility for a series of deadly bombing attacks in Israel.

The bank accounts of the Palestinians' Relief and Development Fund, a charity also known as Interpal, were temporarily closed by the British government.

Neo-Nazi leader Acquitted

BUDAPEST – Thousands of people gathered here to protest the acquittal of a Hungarian neo-Nazi leader who had been charged with inciting racial hatred.

The demonstration came after a Budapest municipal court ruled that there was insufficient evidence to convict Albert Szabo, who openly declares himself the direct ideological heir of the man who led the Hungarian Nazis during World War II.

Olaf Palme Prize

STOCKHOLM – The Youth Dialogue Group of Peace Now in Israel recently received the Olaf Palme Prize at a ceremony held in Stockholm.

The award recognized Peace Now's youth project which involves some 2,000 Israeli and Palestinian students in dialogue and peae programs designed to build mutual understanding and goodwill.

Helping the Jewish Blind

NEW YORK – A record number of professional actors and broadcasters, representing a variety of religious and ethnic groups, are now serving as volunteers to narrate and direct the recording of books for the blind and visually impaired at the Jewish Braille Institute of America.

Merger Plans Finalized

NEW YORK – Jewish leaders have finalized a plan to merge the major American Jewish fundraising organizations and are set to present it to federations across the country in hopes of securing their approval.

The plan is aimed at strengthening flagging campaigns, making the fundraising bureaucracy more efficient and ensuring that domestic and overseas needs are met in a fair and systematic way.

Palestinian Aid Held Up

WASHINGTON – Congress has tightened its noose on $13 million slated for the Palestinian Authority.

The move came this week after hearings on Capitol Hill aimed at investigating the Palestine Liberation Organization's commitment to peace.

Fighting Terrorism

AMMAN – Israel and Jordan have decided to cooperate in their fight against terrorism by setting up a mechanism of joint consultations and information exchange.

Terror Victims Fund Established

TORONTO – The United Jewish Appeal (UJA) has announced the establishment of a fund to assist victims of the recent suicide bombings in Israel.

"The proceeds will be distributed solely to victims and their families," the UJA said in a statement.

Fifty-eight people were killed and some 200 injured by four suicide bombers in attacks between Feb. 25 and March 4 in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Ashkelon.

Donations should be made payable to United Jewish Appeal-Terror Victims Fund and sent to: 4600 Bathurst St. Willowdale, Ont. M2R 3V2 or call the hotline at 416-631-5700 for donations.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

Hate propaganda thrives on Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Internet and other electronic communication networks continue to be used for the dissemination of hate propaganda, but that doesn't mean lawmakers are powerless to deal with the problem, said Marvin Kurz, a spokesperson for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Canadian law applies to transmissions on the Internet if they originate in Canada. But it's almost impossible to determine whether computer hate was posted in Canada or abroad, Kurz, a lawyer, said.

Nevertheless, the Criminal Code allows for the prosecution in Canada of crimes committed outside the country. War crimes and air piracy, among others, are two such crimes deemed to have been committed inside Canada, he said.

In addition, Canada could negotiate treaties with other nations to deal with Internet hate. "We're in the infancy of this ... we're catching up," Kurz said.

Kurz was speaking at a news conference announcing the release of the League's 1995 Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents.

The audit reported 331 incidents of anti-Semitic harassment and vandalism in Canada in 1995, the highest number ever recorded and a 12.1 percent increase over the year before.

Though vandalism decreased in 1995 to 80 incidents from 92, harassment, which includes the publication of hate propaganda and Internet transmissions, increased to 251 incidents from 198.

The audit reported some good news as well. It found that "the organized hate movement in Canada continued to struggle under the weight of legal challenges and public pressure. The Heritage Front ... is still reeling from declining membership, lack of money and the legal troubles of its leaders."

The Nationalist Party of Canada failed in its attempts to convince city governments to promote a European Heritage Day while "the meteoric rise of George Burdi (leader of the rabidly racist Church of the Creator) appears to be crashing in Canada," the audit stated.

"The sources of anti-Semitism have diversified and become more diffuse," the report stated. "Nineteen ninety-five was dominated by several issues which served to increase tensions and anxiety within Jewish communities across the country; namely, the situation in Quebec, increased incidents of anti-Semitism in the media, the targeting of Jews by proselytzing missionary groups and the proliferation of hate propaganda via the Internet."

Although the number of reported anti-Semitic incidents in Quebec dropped in 1995 (from 55 to 52), the report pointed to former premier Jacques Parizeau's post-referendum remarks (blaming the loss on "money and the ethnic vote") and those by Deputy Premier Bernard Landry as causing concern among Jews and other minorities.

There were 159 reported incidents of anti-Semitism in Toronto, up from 146 incidents the year before. Winnipeg reported 14 incidents, the same as the last four years, while Alberta and Saskatchewan reported 13, up from two the previous year.

The number of incidents in British Columbia jumped to 23 from five, representing 6.9 percent of the Canadian total.

The audit cites incidents reported to B'nai Brith offices and lodges across the country, said Karen Mock, national director of the League.

Amital calls for Jewish unity

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish unity and tolerance of dissent should be at the top of the agenda for Israel-Diaspora relations, Israeli cabinet minister Rabbi Yehuda Amital told a synagogue audience here last week.

Rabbi Amital, appointed minister without portfolio in the Shimon Peres government last November, said unity between Jews in Israel and the Diaspora "is more important than ever.

"These are difficult times that call for sophisticated solutions. The slogans of yesterday are no longer adequate," he told some 600 people at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in a low-key address.

Rabbi Amital is also a leader in the hesder yeshivah movement, which combines yeshivah study with military service. He still heads Yeshiva Har Etzion in the West Bank and helped found Meimad, a dovish religious Zionist movement.

In government, he leads the first-ever ministerial commission on Israel-Diaspora relations.

Departing only briefly from a prepared text, he said he had been urged to cancel his North American speaking tour following the recent spate of terrorist attacks in Israel. "I asked the prime minister. He told me, 'You must go.' "

He said the attacks were motivated by religion "in the name of the one God of Jews, Christians and Muslims. No religious person can tolerate such a desecration of God's name."

Terror does not endanger Israel's security, he said.

"We are at war with Hamas. Combatting terror is at the head of our priorities, including the peace process. The Oslo accords will not prevent our security forces from acting anywhere. The entire Palestinian nation must understand it will pay a heavy price for any Hamas attack."

Rabbi Amital said he has "no doubts" that Israel will win the battle against terror.

In the meantime, he said Jews everywhere "have to preserve unity, despite disagreements." But, "unity does not mean uniformity. There are disagreements [but] it is necessary to observe the democratic process. It is the only way to avoid a rift.

"We need tolerance, but a real tolerance. It's not enough to say the opposition are traitors. Tolerance is when you understand the complexity of the situation."

Continuity and battling assimilation are top priorities for Diaspora Jews, he said.

Following the talk, several audience members voiced displeasure at not being allowed to ask questions.

CLARIFICATION

The CJN estimated that 1,500 people attended the community memorial rally which was held on March 7 for the victims of the Hamas bombings. That figure may have been too conservative. The number of people on hand may have been as high as 2,500.

Palestinian's hopes creates feeling of discomfort

From the editor's desk

Trusting that there is still some interest among readers in the Jerusalem media conference, I continue in this column with notes of two more presentations made to our group – both interesting and important, to my mind – by public officials on the last full day of our conference, Feb. 1. Their comments bring a different perspective to the peace process from those which I recorded last week.

Ziad Abu Zayyad, a Palestinian journalist, lawyer and member of the Higher Committee of the Palestinian-Israeli Peace Negotiations spoke to us about Living With the Oslo Accords. In a soft voice, he expressed his deeply-felt optimism about future relations between Israelis and Palestinians. It soon became apparent though, that his optimism envisioned relations predicated upon the fulfilment of desiderata, some of which were decidedly non-desiderata for many in the room, including this writer.

For Abu Zayyad, the peace process was now irreversible. The process had already achieved many positive results for both peoples. He acknowledged that many "delicate issues," such as Jerusalem, final borders, refugees and water rights still remained to be resolved. But "we will overcome them [the delicate issues]. If we want to face the next century strong, we have to set aside political differences and try to work economically together. Economic cooperation is the key to building a prosperous future."

He then spoke about the odious Palestinian National Charter. "The charter and the peace process," he said, "are contradictory. They cannot exist side by side. To be in favor of peace means to be opposed to the charter." He was confident that Yasser Arafat would take the appropriate steps to amend the charter, but he placed some onus on the government of Israel to "help Arafat to convince the two-thirds of the council" needed to make the changes. According to Zayyad, no one among mainstream Palestinians speaks about the destruction of Israel, though he did acknowledge there are indeed some extremists who still speak of Israel's demise.

Abu Zayyad stated that a Palestinian state was inevitable "sooner or later." He emphasized that such a development was not to be feared. It was to be welcomed as a source of stability. I sensed that not too many of us were relieved by his assurances.

He also said that there was no chance for a durable peace without finding a solution to the issue of Jerusalem. Jerusalem should remain undivided but within an arrangement of "two capitals side by side and joint municipal structures. It is a matter of national dignity for the Palestinians and for the Arabs." That statement left most of us somewhat disquieted.

Later the same day, we met Dr. Marwan Muashar, the ambassador of Jordan to Israel. He described the state of peace between his country and Israel. In contrast to the understated tone of Abu Zayyad, Muashar was enthusiastic and up-beat. Where Abu Zayyad spoke of objectives yet to be achieved, Muashar described objectives already achieved.

Speaking forcefully, he made the point that "peace was good for business and that business was good for peace. The relationship [between the two countries] is progressing in a healthy manner. Last year was spent in setting the proper framework for the future. Fifteen sub-agreements arising from the peace treaty have already been concluded."

Muashar pointed out that the language of the peace treaty envisions maximum contact and interaction between the two countries. For example, there are 20 references in the treaty to "cooperation," 11 references to "mutuality" and 10 references to "joint efforts" for the development of the Jordan Rift Valley.

Optimistic message

The ambassador did confirm that indeed "there is still some opposition on the streets to peace with Israel. But as long as the opposition is expressed reasonably, peacefully and openly, there is nothing to worry about. The majority of Jordanians are in favor of peace with Israel. But peace-building, breaking down the psychological barriers, getting to know each other ... will take time. More than 100,000 Israelis have visited Jordan since the signing of the agreement. Around 20,000 Jordanians have visited Israel. We have come a long way in the last four years."

Muashar stated, as did Abu Zayyad and the other Arab speakers, that "there will not be total peace for the area and for the peoples of the region unless the issue of Jerusalem is solved." But he clearly implied that the solution to Jerusalem can be found without compromising sovereignty, on the basis of religious accommodations between peoples.

Then, choosing his words very carefully, Muashar carried his optimistic message to an even higher level. "The peace treaty with Jordan will not be affected in any way by the negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. We are committed to peace. Assassinations are things of the past. The murder of Rabin generated a great deal of sympathy in Jordan. The peace process has become truly irreversible. There are enough facts on the ground that even a change of government in Israel should not affect the momentum for peace."

In next week's column, I hope to close the notebook of my recent visit to Israel. I will share some of my observations of the people with whom we travelled and the places we saw on our second field trip within Jerusalem. MBD

Youth Aliyah and Youth Services

The story of Youth Aliyah began with a dream and the determination of two heroic women. On January 30, 1933, the day the Nazis took power, Youth Aliyah was officially established. Recha Freier, a Jewish woman from Berlin sent the first group of youngsters out of Germany. Under the leadership of Henrietta Szold, prominent Zionist leader and President of Hadassah, Youth Aliyah was transformed into a movement to rescue Jewish children and bring them to Israel. The contribution these children have made to the strengthening of the Jewish nation, including the establishment of fifty kibbutzim, has been immense.

Since that first boatload of children reached Israel, some 300,000 children, Israeli-born and immigrant alike, have been touched by the special world that is Youth Aliyah and Youth Services. The projects in Israel provide facilities and assistance for the cultural, social and educational integration of youngsters aged 12-18, youngsters who might otherwise find themselves confined to the fringes of Israeli society. The projects also deal with immigrant youth from deprived countries with a current emphasis on the Former Soviet Union.

Jewish Defence League seeks membership in CJC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Defence League (JDL), long-considered a fringe group in the Jewish community, even by its leader, is seeking to join the mainstream.

Last week, the JDL applied to Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) Ontario office for "organizational membership." The request was forwarded to Congress' national head office in Montreal where Jack Silverstone, CJC's national executive director, said it would be considered like all applications.

However, the fact the JDL sent copies of its application to The CJN and to a second media outlet suggests this might be merely a publicity stunt by the JDL, Silverstone said.

"I find it unusual that an application for affiliation was also sent to the media," he said.

Meir Halevi, national chair of the JDL, said the decision to join Congress was made after the "latest round of terrorist attacks in Israel. We thought we'd like to take a more active role ... Congress is the pre-eminent organization that represents the Canadian Jewish community and we want to be part of it.

A gadfly on the fringe

"We don't want to be just a gadfly on the fringe of the community excluded from major events. We want to take part."

In his letter to Congress, Halevi also stated: "We demand the same democratic right that the Peace Now organization currently enjoys within the CJC."

Halevi said the JDL would bring its knowledge of security matters to Congress (he's employed in a firm that provides security to the retail industry, among others), alleging the threat to Jewish buildings and organizations from Hamas extremists is very real.

Silverstone said Congress is open to groups representing a variety of political viewpoints and affiliations, but they must meet criteria set out in Congress' bylaws. They must be national in scope, maintain a national office with an executive director and have a board of directors, he said.

The organization must must also subscribe to the aims and objectives of Congress as stated in its bylaws, he added.

Halevi said he'd perused Congress' bylaws and believes the JDL complies with them. He said that at its peak, the organization had a list of supporters and members that numbered 5,000. But that list was about 10 years old and "I don't have an official count right now."

Halevi said Congress had been cool to the JDL in the past and that if it will not accept the JDL, "we'll fight this in the courts."

Strike fails to halt kosher meat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The three-week-old strike by Ontario public servants, including meat inspectors, has had little effect on the supply of kosher meat.

This, according to Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is because all kosher meat in Toronto is under federal inspection.

Local butcher shops, including Perl's, Hartman's and Goldstein's, confirmed to The CJN that they only buy meat from federally inspected suppliers.

Phil Serriera, a meat buyer for Oshawa Foods, owner of Food City, said that the same holds true for their kosher purchases. The Food City at Clark and Hilda has a large kosher department.

Sylvia Bielak of Lazar Yitzchok, which supplies meat to several chain stores, including Miracle Mart, echoed the belief of all the kosher meat suppliers and Rabbi Levin that federal meat inspection standards are much higher in terms of quality, cleanliness and equipment requirements.

Several kosher caterers said that they have not had any problems with their meat supply either. Doreen Greenspan of Jacob's Catering said that she had had phone calls from concerned clients with simchahs coming up in the near future, but she was able to reassure them that there was no problem.

Crown withdraws charges against pro-Nazi Zundel

By PAUL LUNGEN

TORONTO — Ontario's Ministry of the Attorney General has once again slammed the door shut on a bid to have pro-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel charged with hate-related offences.

Citing insufficient evidence, the Crown last week withdrew the charges of conspiracy to promote hatred and of publishing defamatory libel targetting several Jews.

The charges resulted from a private complaint initiated by Sabina Citron, co-founder of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association. Citron had laid the charges against the Toronto Nazi propagandist on Nov. 8 and a Justice of the Peace subsequently accepted them.

She said she laid the charges out of frustration at the government's unwillingness to prosecute Zundel under federal anti-hate laws. The consent of the attorney general is required for such a prosecution to proceed, and Citron had hoped to sidestep that requirement by charging Zundel with conspiracy.

Citron was angry at the latest government announcement, and she and about 15 to 20 supporters demonstrated outside the attorney general's downtown office to protest the decision.

"This is outrageous," she told The CJN. "The material we provided [as evidence] is extremely virulent [and goes beyond] incitement to hatred.

"We will not allow Zundel to continue his campaign. The decision to drop the charges is misguided and ill conceived."

Citron said she planned to sue Zundel for libel. "He's defaming me personally and my people generally. No amount of damages are appropriate when you're killing someone's character. We demand he stop the vilification and defamation of the Jewish people."

According to written material provided by the attorney general's office, the evidence provided by Citron consisted of a videotape of a CBC production, Hi-tech Hate, a transcript of a fifth estate broadcast that examined Zundel's Internet computer activities, and a May 10, 1995 edition of a magazine published by Zundel called Power.

Evidence of conspiracy between Zundel and associates in Germany is weak and there is no evidence that a breach of the peace would result, which is required in the conspiracy charge, the Crown asserted.

In addition, there was "no reasonable prospect of a conviction" on the defamatory libel charge.

Citron was highly critical of Attorney General Charles Harnick, who, when he served as Opposition critic, she pointed out, had censured the previous Ontario government for not charging Zundel.

Other Jewish groups said they would continue to gather evidence of Zundel's propaganda, with a view to supporting hate charges against him.

"We will maintain this as the highest priority — that Zundel's hatemongering business is put out of business," said Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Steven Shulman.

"That [Zundel] continues to disseminate his hateful messages worldwide is a national disgrace," said Karen Mock, spokesperson for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Tax changes could aid UJA

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal (UIA) anticipates that it will have more contributors as a result of recent tax changes.

In last week's federal budget, Finance Minister Paul Martin announced an increase in allowable deductions for charitable donations. The limit for charitable deductions has been increased from 20 percent of net income to 50 percent.

Michael Daren, vice-chair of next year's UJA campaign, said he is pleased the government is recognizing the difficulties facing charitable organizations under current economic conditions.

He said the increase will especially help parents who send children to day schools. "Now they can benefit from a larger deduction," he explained.

Other budget revisions affecting wills, bequests and capital asset donations will, according to Daren, "create more opportunities for planned giving and make it easier to donate capital property."

Over the next 11 months, the government will be studying other ways of encouraging the public to help charities raise funds needed more than ever as a result of recent cutbacks in social programs.

A mameloshen translation

TORONTO — Students in one popular Yiddish course hear classic stories in English and are asked to give their own Yiddish translation.

This approach has proved so popular that the class taught by David Newman at Adath Israel Synagogue will reconvene Wednesday, March 27, for 10 weeks, from 7.30 to 9.30 p.m.

About 40 students, most of them seniors, took the course first semester and an even larger enrolment is predicted for the new session, said Louis Gula, convener of the class.

Cost is $6 for seniors (60 and over), $70 for others.

Na'amat launching legal advisory clinic

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Inspired by comprehensive legal services offered by Na'amat in Israel, Na'amat Canada (which raises funds for those services) is launching its own legal advisory clinic here as a pilot project in mid-April.

The free clinic, geared to serve the needs of women clients, will be open one evening a week, by appointment only. Staffed by over 50 volunteers, among them 20 lawyers (all women) who will work on a rotating basis, the clinic will also offer babysitting if needed.

Appointments will run 30 minutes, and an effort will be made to match clients to lawyers with expertise in the area in which help is needed.

Participating lawyers have up-to-date information on the issue of agunot (women whose husbands won't grant them a Jewish divorce), an area of law in which some lawyers and judges are still not well-versed, according to agunah rights activists.

The lawyers are also prepared to offer advice on problems ranging from debt collection to employment difficulties to buying a house to sponsorship of relatives for immigration.

Some of the other cities in which Na'amat Canada has a presence have begun to take steps toward establishing their own legal advice projects, said Etty Danzig, national president of the organization.

In addition to its 27 clubs in Toronto, Na'amat Canada, established in 1925, has a presence in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Windsor, Hamilton, Ottawa and Montreal. There are about 75 clubs altogether.

"Most people don't know what their [legal] rights are or what's available to them," said Danzig.

"[The clinic] will point them in the right direction," said Esther Rodzynek, outgoing president of Na'amat Toronto. "Problems can't [necessarily] be solved in half an hour."

The organization has also made an effort to help abused wives help themselves, with the recent publication of an information-packed pamphlet entitled I Can't Believe it's Happening...Breaking the Cycle of Domestic Violence. The resource guide can be found in places like libraries, pharmacies and doctors' offices.

Based on a similar project of Na'amat in Los Angeles and developed with input from government agencies and the Metropolitan Toronto Police, the pamphlet includes characteristics of abusers, how to help someone in a violent relationship and what to expect when police are contacted. Phone numbers for local women's shelters, telephone distress lines and 24-hour hospital-based sexual assault care centres are listed.

More than 1,500 brochures have been distributed and a second printing is imminent.

A related project of Na'amat Canada, along with the Tel Aviv Foundation, is a combined women's shelter/treatment centre scheduled to open in Tel Aviv this fall. The shelter is being built to house 18 women and their families.

Among the activities planned to raise money for the shelter is a wellness seminar series, which began last month with a session on stress management. Upcoming sessions include Re-entering the Paid Work Force (March 26), The Food and Fitness Connection (April 30) and Conflict, Resolution and Effective Communication in the Family (May 21). All sessions take place at 7:45 p.m. at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation at a cost of $10 per session.

Students raise funds to help out Israelis

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Once the recent community and campus vigils to commemorate the victims of the bombings in Israel were over, university and college students were among those asking themselves, "What now?"

A decision was made last week to quickly pull together a fundraiser on behalf of those injured in the terrorist bombings as well as the families of those killed in the attacks. Money raised at the March 30 event will be donated to the victim support fund set up by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"I think it's really galvanized the Jewish student community," said Pearl Gropper, director of York University's Jewish Student Federation (JSF).

For the first time, she noted, students from campus organizations JSF, Hillel-JSU at the University of Toronto (U of T), and the Hillel groups at Ryerson Polytechnic University, George Brown College and Seneca College are joining forces with Tagar (the youth arm of Herut-Likud), UJA on Campus, Jewish fraternity AEII, the Osgoode and U of T chapters of the Canadian Jewish Law Students Association (CJLSA) and Network (the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students) to organize the evening.

The fundraiser, with deejay Universal Sound, will take place at The Concert Hall on March 30. Doors open at 9 p.m. Tickets are $5 in advance and $7 at the door. For further information, contact Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto at 416-512-0814, the JSF at 416-736-5178 or Hillel-JSU at 416-978-0422.

Symbol, not substance

In what was hailed by the speechmaker himself as "the first time a premier of Quebec has extended an invitation to such a broad segment of Quebec's anglophone community," Premier Lucien Bouchard delivered a public discourse last week to 400 specially selected leaders in Montreal. Describing the Oct. 30 referendum as a watershed event, which it surely was, the premier said it was time "to engage in a dialogue ... to create a new atmosphere."

By all accounts, the tone of the address was soft-spoken and respectful. And certainly the justification for the presentation was laudable: to ensure that channels of communication remain open. But past its tone and its justification, the premier's address was significantly devoid of substance. It did not speak at all of attempting to find new, common political ground on which to stand side by side. Indeed, its underlying premise was that separation was inevitable, merely a formality of surveying the landscape in an undefined but not-too-distant future. Anglophone Quebec should prepare, because "there are quite a few things we on both sides can do to get through the next referendum. We can be clear and fair about the rights of Quebec citizens following a Yes."

Whether we are anglophone, francophone or allophone, federalists will not detach themselves from Canada. We might as well detach ourselves from the changing of the seasons. Bouchard continuously ignores this truth. Moreover, a close reading of his remarks seems to suggest that he still aims at distorting this truth to persuade the undecided "soft" separatists to vote Yes.

In the form of a cleverly-disguised criticism of the federal government, Bouchard again suggests the possibility that Quebecers will be able to retain their Canadian citizenship and passports within a sovereign Quebec, though this is contrary to oft-expressed, unambiguous opinion in the rest of Canada and clearly flies in the face of countless contradictory statements by officials in Ottawa.

Bouchard stated: "We know that the new federal minister for Immigration has been looking at ways to ensure that after sovereignty, Canadian citizens living in Quebec who wish to remain Canadian citizens would be denied that possibility. I very much doubt this is feasible. But if it were, it would be a ruthless move that would fuel the anguish of the very Quebecers who are most attached to Canada. Quite bluntly, in the name of 'peace, order and good government,' Ottawa would be wise to abandon such a short-sighted policy."

This is an unworthy tactic by the premier, for it belies his desire to create a new atmosphere. It releases once again into an already uncertain and anxious environment, the residue of noxious and painful fumes. Moreover, his reference to "peace order and good government" is an affront to the founding, compromise-oriented ethos of the country he is trying so assiduously to dismantle. Stripped of its symbolism, what remains of the premier's first-ever invitation to Quebec's anglophone community? The premier and his government are determined to break up Canada. There is no "new atmosphere" in which that result is palatable to federalists.

The irony, and indeed one might add the disingenuousness of the premier's position falls out of his very own words. "The fact is that this question [sovereignty or federalism] will be decided, democratically, through a referendum. There will be a majority and events will unfold." In truth, the fact is that the question has already been decided twice, democratically, through a referendum. And each time, a majority of Quebec voters rejected sovereignty. Indeed, the second result, as many have observed, was recorded despite an electoral apparatus severely tilted against the federalists.

But these democratically-achieved results are not the ones Bouchard wanted. Thus it is only a feeble and faint respect that he feels he owes to them. Otherwise, he would have removed, at least for a generation, the sword of sovereignty from above the head of the majority of Quebecers that has already twice expressed its preference for federalism.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

March 21, 1941 Rabbi Gershon Levi became the first Jewish Canadian army chaplain during World War II. Over the next five years, he organized the the chaplaincy service for the more than 16,000 Jews serving in the armed forces. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Take politics out of memorial services

Like many of the Jews around the world, in the past several weeks I have been unfortunate enough to attend two memorials for Israelis killed in terrorist attacks in Jerusalem. I do not believe that I am naive, but since when have memorials become a forum for political expression? The constant discussion amongst those attending the memorials and those addressing the community forces one to ask the underlying question, "Would these terrorist attacks have happened if Likud was in power?" Quite frankly, who cares?

Maybe it is just me, but perhaps it's time we condemn Hamas and its associates for the terrorism, instead of the Israeli government. Last time I checked, I was at the memorial to honor the memory of those who were killed, to wish those injured a speedy recovery and to comfort the families who continue to mourn their lost mothers, fathers, siblings and children. What is significant here is that those who perished are not "victims of peace" but "victims of war." A war that will continue unfortunately, with or without the peace process and with or without Labor or Likud leadership.

When it comes down to it, Hamas didn't stop to question the civilians on the bus as to which political party they supported, why should we? Let's put political discussion aside and mourn those we've lost.

Palestinian calls for peace

There is a long history of violence in the Middle East. Acknowledging that neither party shall go away, new thinking emerged and a few courageous men started what is now known as the peace process, which presented itself as a credible alternative to the vicious circle of violence. No one ever said that the peace process would be easy or that it would come without cost on either side.

There is only one way out of this vicious circle and that is the resumption of the newly developed method of dealing with the conflict — i.e. the peace process. Calls for revenge shall, if successful, bring to all parties more of the same. It is the historic responsibility of the peace-oriented elements on both sides to marginalize the revenge-oriented elements on their respective sides by advancing the peace process even faster, and to clearly demonstrate by deeds its benefits to their respective constituencies. There is no other way to continue the pursuit for a resolution to this conflict and the parties have no other reasonable alternative but to continue.

During the coming few weeks and months, there shall be a great challenge to those who believe in the peace process to hold on to it, no matter what. Those who are re-evaluating their support for the peace process must remember that the alternative is more of precisely what is making them re-evaluate, except without hope for an end in sight.

Attacks Mike Harris policies

Rabbi Dow Marmur has given us a carefully crafted and highly effective critique of the Harris government, based on our Jewish traditions and teachings. Lorie Goldstein, on the other hand, (CJN, March 7) has no interest in a Jewish perspective and is apparently upset because a rabbi is commenting on the real world — or maybe it's just that he doesn't like what is said. (Interestingly, Goldstein's polemic contains several powerful reasons to oppose the Tories and no convincing reasons to support them.)

As a resident of Ontario, I oppose Harris because I don't want to live in Jersey City. As a taxpayer with a PhD in economics, I fight his fraudulent fiscal and spending policies, which will leave a huge tax bill for all of us when the next government begins to undo the harm done by the Tories. But most of all, as a Jew, I fear the narrowness, intolerance and authoritarianism of Harris, the not-so-subtle endorsation of sexism, racism, bigotry and anti-immigrant sentiment.

Harmony between blacks and Jews

I suggest that black and Jewish leaders in Canada and the United States meet in harmonious dialogue, iron out our differences and live in harmony and understanding. Remember nothing is impossible.

We can't help what we are born, black, white, red or yellow; that is in the hands of the Creator. Remember we all go back to the dust from whence we came. Let's stop this eternal hate.

Please, please, if we can't love one another, at least can we not respect each other.

Hebron — a living symbol of Jewish resistance

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN-AYON

The ride was quite typical, swaying with careening turns, and stomachs bouncing to no particular rhythm. It was late Friday afternoon, during a cold rain storm, and we were being taken into Hebron for Shabbat. An air of silent sobriety prevailed, a nagging uncertainty, as we questioned our own wisdom. To be sure, we had all chosen Hebron over other decidedly more conventional and tamer places to rest during the Sabbath. But now there was no turning back.

Through thick and foggy plastic windows, we saw a surprisingly large and seemingly uninhabited city. Street after empty street, we could only see closed or shuttered windows and shops. Friday, the Muslim holy day, and the sun's setting combined with the weather to give an eerie and deserted look.

Hebron is an ancient city. With Abraham's purchase of the "field" from Ephron the Hittite, the Torah records this as the first parcel of Holy Land real estate. It is rich in history; King David chose it over 3,000 years ago as the capital of his nascent kingdom. Above all else in significance is the undisputed fact that it is the burial place of our patriarchs and matriarchs. Here lie Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah. This is its essence and its focus.

There has always been a Jewish presence in Hebron. In 1929, a savage pogrom left Hebron judenrein. After the 1967 war, the West Bank came under the administration of the Israeli Defence Forces.

Today, there are 52 Jewish families, which together with a yeshivah, comprise Hebron's Jewish population of just under 500. The ratio of Jew to Muslim is 500 to 60,000 (or even 100,000), depending on which suburbs are included.

Our minibus came to an abrupt stop; here we were. Its door slid open and the driver pointed in the general direction of an alley. Vehicles could get not closer, he explained, pointing to concrete roadblocks. We gathered our overnight bags and ran through the rain as he sped off.

At the end of the alley, we found a modern square, an oasis amid old and decrepit buildings. Here, under an overhang, we awaited further instructions.

Jews in Israel live on the "other" side of the Green Line for a variety of reasons, mainly economic, but also for the quiet lifestyle of a Yishuv, the breathtaking beauty of Gaza's coast or the fertile hills of the Golan. One makes his home in Hebron, lives and raises a family here for only one reason — ideological. To live in Hebron is not life on the frontier. It is life inside an enemy camp. The Jews, we found, don't live in a ghetto. Instead, they are dispersed in clusters, about a half dozen, all within 10 to 12 minutes walk from each other.

Our host soon found us huddling in our shelter. After the necessary niceties, he told us we would shortly be praying at the Machpelah, the cave in which the patriarchs and matriarchs are entombed. One does not actually enter the cave, but rather the building over it, an impressive edifice of Herodian construction that serves as both synagogue and mosque.

Since the cave was reopened after the horrific massacre by Baruch Goldstein, the two faiths are rigorously segregated. There are separate entrances with dual airport-type checkpoints at each.

Inside there were five different prayer groups ranging in size from 30 to several hundred. Men, women and children from adjoining Kiryat Arba walk down to join the Jews of Hebron in welcoming the Shabbat. The groups overflow into each other, as do their melodies. The atmosphere defies definition. It is electric and joyous; there is fervor and dancing during the prayer.

Intermittently, I remind myself that this is taking place over a tomb, indeed quite a venerable one. Yet, somehow, it is all totally appropriate.

Shabbat dinner is hosted by a Yemenite family. Tall tan-skinned and beautifully fine-featured children sit around the table. The apartment, by Israel standards, could be anywhere. It is clean and comfortable, the kitchen is well equipped. But this is Bet Hadassah, one of the clusters, so named because it was rebuilt on Hadassah property that was once a hospital/clinic and general address for social assistance to Jew and Arab alike.

A scene of the Avraham Avinu Synagogue and the soldiers who guard it inside the Cave of the Machphela, just after it reopened in December 1994. [Isranet photo]

Our hostess serves us exquisite and authentic fare. We listen to our host, as he in turn patiently listens to his children review the parshah and their previous week's progress at school. Each child glows in the parental attention accorded to him. Mentally I note that the sheer normalcy of this Shabbat scene is insane.

C'mon, I tell myself, this is Hebron. I search for tension, fear and anxiety and find none. After the meal, our group is to meet at the Machpelah. Our host, perhaps sensing my own fear, tension and anxiety, walks us the 10 minutes to the Machpelah.

The streets are still deserted. Since our arrival in the city centre this afternoon, we have yet to see an Arab, such is their lifestyle. There is not a single theatre or night spot in the city; all cafes close well before nightfall. The self-imposed curfew is a carry-over from their desert existence. I marvel that even their youth dare not breach this.

At the Machpelah, we meet our guide, a charming young lady. She is as full of facts and stories as she is full of life, and quite passionate about life in Hebron. It is now fashionable to show solidarity with the Yishuvim by spending Shabbat with them. She acts as the hostess to Hebron.

The Machpelah closes promptly at 9 p.m. and the soldiers gently inform us it is time to go home. Instead, I take a different trip — one of guilt. For as we prepare to go to warm and clean beds, these same boys must remain guarding me, out in the damp, dark cold. Not only this night but every night. The selfishness of this thought haunts me incessantly. Hot coffee and cake are periodically distributed to the soldiers by the yeshivah boys — a small consolation.

Instinctively, on the way back I climb up to one roof-top sentry point. Two soldiers there are at once startled and bemused at seeing me. We sit for a while overlooking a valley of more roof-tops and trade stories. When I leave them, my guilt intensifies.

Shabbat morning, we awaken to a different city. At 6 a.m., its streets are crowded and bursting with activity. The Jewish clusters are located right in middle of the old market, a sprawling and teaming middle eastern souk.

I walk to the Machpelah alone. The shuttered street of yesterday holds the chicken abattoirs of today. Crates of live chickens are loaded and unloaded everywhere. Women effortlessly pass by, transporting large bundles balanced on the top of their heads. A donkey speeds by in the silliest gait.

My presence in a dark western suit could not be more conspicuous or incongruous. While no one is making eye contact, I realize all eyes are on me. Nervously, I look up to assure myself that the roof-top sentries know I am there. They do. In relay fashion, I move from one protective eye to the next.

I enter the Machpelah with five Lubavitch Chassidim wearing their distinctive hats and frocks. On their sholders are slung semi-automatics. As we exchange "Good Shabbos," I wonder if anyone back home will believe me ... I'm not certain I believe my own eyes!

Morning prayers are much more subdued and this lends itself to better observation. I'm introduced to a man who recently lost his 17-year-old daughter to terrorism and I fumble for words. He doesn't want any; instead he talks and I listen.

Someone points out a handsome young man. His father and brother both fell in Dr. Baruch Goldstein's arms (this subsequently caused him to snap). Over there is the family left orphaned by a bullet into her father's head as he sat on a bus. Just outside is the monument to the yeshivah boy who bled to death after being stabbed dozens of times. This is a tour of terror and pain. The story of Hebron is written with the quill of hatred and the ink of blood.

Lunch is at Bet Schneerson with a mature couple. He is from New York, she from Chicago and both their accents betray them.

Again, as they talk, I am struck by their serenity and capacity for articulation. It all seems so clear and logical.

"If we don't have the right to live in Hebron, we don't, or won't have the right to Jerusalem or Tel Aviv. Surely, I want peace. I want to say hello to my Arab neighbor when I see her day in and day out, as we have for years when we both hang out laundry on the roof. It's not me, not being able to greet the same faces I cross daily in the street. I would like to shop again at the shouk, but we don't. The hatred is simply too great.

Below the window is a collection of pens and cages. This is the Hebron "zoo," really just a collection of farm animals, but significant, as it is a project of the children themselves. Nothing amazes one more in this place than the children — how they walk about from cluster to cluster among the Arabs. Are they fearless or reckless? I don't know.

Dozens of bicycles line a wall. When it is not Shabbat, they actually cycle about! I am told that nothing irks the Arab population more than the self-confidence of these children, as they go about their business of being children right under their noses.

I look forward to the afternoon, for we are about to hear Rabbi Levinger a man larger than life, reputed to be the radical of radicals. Instead, his rebbitzen speaks, a personality in her own right.

I am dazzled by this grandmotherly figure, by her wisdom, by her force, as much as by her feminine humility. She can be gentle one moment, as she speaks about herself and the people of Hebron, and a firecracker the next, as she bemoans the decline of democracy, the calibre of Israeli politics or the bankrupt values of secularism. For over an hour, we sit mesmerized by her charisma. Truly a modern day version of the Prophetess Devorah.

Maariv is said outdoors by the burial spot of Ruth, great-grandmother of King David. With the coming of the stars, Shabbat comes to an end, all too soon. Just then a minor commotion draws our attention. Out of nowhere, rolling towards us is a tire set ablaze!

Not an uncommon event, but not as disturbing as what happened the next morning. As we were about to board for our ride out of Hebron, a car pulled alongside of us. Both driver and passsenger had expressionless faces as they filmed us, panning in particular on our faces. It was the CSS (Israel's version of the CIA).

"They are here to record your visit; because of it, you are now officially on file as extremist radicals," we were told.

Just as our arrival was in silence, so was our departure. The loudest silence of all was the silence projected by the people of Hebron, the calculated calm of a community determined and biding its time. A noose tightens daily around Hebron; it is the countdown to redeployment. My heart and thoughts remain in Hebron, the living symbol of Jewish resistance and struggle for survival. May the G-d of Abraham stand by its men, women and children.

Purim was a time to mourn and celebrate

On March 5, I got 22 e-mail messages. Every message was about the bombings in Israel, the suicidal bombings engineered by Hamas. Some of the messages were from my high school friends at different universities in Ontario and Quebec. But most were from my friends in Israel.

By Viva Press

Roni, Stacey, Ahron and others sent me the details the Halifax newspapers did not cover. They wrote to me about their fear and anguish and the despair and anger of the Israelis. They described the troops of soldiers stationed everywhere. A few wrote to tell me that they were returning home early from their year of study abroad; home to their families in Canada or the United States.

It was erev Purim. And I was deeply despondent on what was supposed to be a happy day.

When I heard about the Dizengoff bomb in Tel Aviv, I was shaken. This was the fourth bomb in nine days. I thought of my friends and family in Israel. I thought of the Israelis among whom I had lived and worked. I thought of how I felt when the Afula and Hadera bombs erupted while I was living in the Golan in 1994. I read through the e-mails again and again. And I wished I was there. In Israel. Now.

It is a strange phenomenon to many of my friends at the University of King's College that I would want to be in Israel during this time of unrest. Some have told me that I must have a death-wish. I don't. I just want to be with the Israelis at this moment in time and to share in their grief.

Of course, I would be scared stiff if I was there. But everyone around me would be scared too.

I have lived in Israel for three- or four-month stints in the past two years. And every time I leave there, I take a part of the country, the people and the life with me.

A Jewish friend asked me if I would ride the buses if I was in Israel now. I said yes. She didn't believe me. I told her that when I was in Israel in 1994 and 1995 I rode the buses all over the country. After the first suicide bomb in Afula exploded, I still took the bus. And after the Hadera bomb, I continued to ride the buses. It was my way of getting around. Yes, I would be cautious; but no, I would not stop riding the buses.

Just as I do not denounce those who choose not to ride the bus, nor condemn those who, out of fear, have returned from Israel to Canada, I had hoped that my friend would understand my feeling that if I were in Israel I would still have to live my life as normally as possible. But she couldn't or wouldn't understand. How could I be afraid of potential bombs yet still ride the buses?

And here in Halifax it was a holiday. Purim. We were supposed to be celebrating.

Ironically, the Shabbat immediately preceding Purim is called Shabbat Zachor. Zachor means to remember. In Deuteronomy we read the commandment to remember what the nation of Amalek did to us when we left Egypt, attacking the faint and weary Israelites at the rear of the march.

The Amalekites' goal was to destroy Israel. And it was the goal of Hamas to destroy the Jews at the very time that we were getting ready to celebrate our victory over Haman.

I went to shul with three friends, none of whom felt like dressing up. I had mixed feelings too. Yes, it was Purim. But it was also a day for mourning. It was a day to celebrate the Jews' conquest over Haman. And it was also a day to mourn innocent victims dressed in Purim costumes who were murdered by the Hamas.

Before the Purim service began at the Sha'ar Shalom Synagogue, to which I go in Oxford Street, Rabbi Pamela Hoffman pointed out that although we all felt sorrow in our hearts, it is a mitzvah to celebrate Purim.

And so, the K'El Maleh Rachamim was recited for the victims of the attacks in Israel. And then the Megillah was read. After every mention of Haman's name, the noise from the graggers filled the shul. One of my friends whispered to me that it's not only Haman we are blocking out with noise, but Hamas too. And all of our enemies who attack Israel.

That's why I dressed up. That's why I told my friends that if I was in Israel now I would ride the buses to get around. Of course I would. Hamas will not control my life.

I celebrated Purim. I shall celebrate Pesach. And I will always continue to celebrate Israel as the Jewish homeland. Nobody will drive us out of our land.

Hamas: balancing theory with emotion

The events of the last three weeks in Israel horrified, pained and frightened Jews the world over. Along with the pain and fear comes a sense of frustration that can prevent clear analysis of the political reality underlying the bombings.

By Ilan Gewurz

To properly understand the political dynamics, one must first explore the reality of the Hamas threat. What type of movement is Hamas, how is it perceived within Palestinian society and what is the true nature of the challenge it represents?

Hamas is more than just a militant terrorist organization; it is also a social organization that provides many important programs and enjoys deep-seated legitimacy among the Palestinian people. The Islamic Resistance Movement (Hamas) emerged out of the existing Muslim Brotherhood with the start of the intifadah.

The largest Islamic movement across the Arab world, the Brotherhood is devoted to a process of educating Muslims and raising a religious Islamic society. It undertakes the establishment of religious schools, charity associations and other forms of social programming. Because of its non-violent nature, the Brotherhood was allowed to exist freely under Israeli rule. With the start of the intifadah, the newly-founded Hamas built upon the Brotherhood's legitimacy and took over its role and social functions.

The Gulf War marked an important turning point for the organization. Unlike PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, it was restrained in its support for Saddam Hussein. Following the war, Hamas became the beneficiary of Saudi and Kuwaiti anger with Arafat and was able to make significant political headway at the expense of the PLO.

Hamas enjoys a measure of public support among Palestinians. On the eve of the Oslo accord, polls showed that Hamas enjoyed the support of over 15 percent of the population in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and constituted the most significant challenge to the leadership of the PLO.

However, bimonthly polls conducted in the West Bank and Gaza Strip have shown that support for Hamas drops and support for the Palestinian Authority rises following political breakthroughs with Israel when hope of tangible results are high. Conversely, in times when the peace process appears to be stalled, support for Hamas rises. Thus, Hamas opposition since the start of the peace process has come not only to represent an alternative to the PLO for local Palestinians but also to serve as an expression of disenchantment with the peace process.

Arafat would prefer to follow Jordan's example, where the king has managed to co-opt the moderate Islamists in the political arena by constraining them within the system, rather than follow the model of Algeria, where crushing the Islamic fundamentalist group served to marginalize many moderates.

From Arafat's point of view, therefore, his "carrot and stick" approach is appropriate. He aims to appease Hamas sufficiently to co-opt its moderate supporters. Polls have shown that over 41 percent of Hamas supporters oppose violence against Israeli civilians. At the same time, he cracks down on Hamas sufficiently to appease Israel and move ahead with the process. This seems to have had some success. Following the Palestinian election, polls showed Hamas support in the West Bank and Gaza to have dropped below 10 percent .

How helpful is it for us to understand Arafat's "predicament," in determining our own best interests? Where do we draw the line between allowing Arafat to deal with his own domestic challenges in his own way and having to bear the painful consequences of his "political" challenges? Should the fact that Arafat and other leaders attended the funeral of "the Engineer" and called him a "great martyr" be written-off as necessary concessions? What if it is true, as many analysts have suggested, that the recent attacks occurred because Hamas is divided, weak and desperate? Is a weak Hamas under Arafat less or more of a threat than a strong Hamas under Israel?

On the other hand, what is our alternative to the peace process? Before we decide where to draw the line, we must seriously consider whether the bombings and the loss of life are truly the necessary cost of a successful process. Arafat may not be able to put an end to the violence against Israel, but we must ask whether he is doing everything in his power.

Rabin was not the first

It is a sad fact that Yitzhak Rabin was not the first Jewish leader to be assassinated by a fellow Jew. There was one other instance that shook a nascent Jewish nation in Eretz Yisrael, in June 1933.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

At the time Chaim Arlosoroff was among the most prominent Jews of the Yishuv. He had come from Ukraine some nine years before. A poet, prolific essayist and political activist he soon became a leading member of the Weizmann-Ben-Gurion party and developed ideas which were revolutionary for his time. Chief amongst these was a practical acknowledgement that Jews were sharing the land with resident Arabs, and that some accommodation between the two would have to be found.

Also, he foresaw the need for rescuing Jews from a desperate situation which would develop in the foreseeable future. Even though Hitler had just come to power, Arlosoroff foretold a mass emigration from the Diaspora to Palestine, and urged his fellow Jews to make provisions for it. In a secret letter to Chaim Weizmann he urged the Zionist movement to accept the inevitability of a future world war and to make provisions for such an eventuality.

As the influence of Arlosoroff grew in the Yishuv, so did opposition to his novel ideas. Heated and often vituperative public exchanges took place — and at the time many people suspected that the verbal attacks on Arlosoroff led to his terrible end. For in June 1933, he was assassinated by unknown assailants while walking with his wife on the Tel Aviv seashore.

Subsequently, upon identification by Arlosoroff's widow, various Revisionists were arrested, but all denied any involvement. A district court convicted Abraham Stavsky of the crime, but the Supreme Court overturned his conviction for lack of corroborating evidence.

No one was ever apprehended again, although some time later two young Arabs (who were in jail) confessed to the crime. They later retracted their confession, claiming that they had been bribed to make it. Chief Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook was firmly convinced that accusing Jews of the assassination was a gentile blood label encouraged by the British Mandatory administration.

But at the time, Jews persisted in believing that it was another Jew who, for political motives had killed the labor leader, and historians have tended to agree. In Arlosoroff's memory, many streets in small and large towns have been named after him, as were three settlements: K'far Chayim, Kibbutz Givat Chavim and Kiryat Chayim (located near Haifa).

The ultimate irony in this unsolved puzzle is the way in which Stavsky eventually died. When David Ben-Gurion ordered the destruction of the gun-laden ship Altalena, in an internecine fight, 14 men were slain, amongst them Stavsky. The head of the Palmach forces that fired on the ship was Yitzhak Rabin.

Arlosoroff was only 34 years old when he died.
